Companion Volume to 'The Councillors' Handbook,' by Herbert and Jenkin.

It will be recalled that the principal author of 'The Councillors' Handbook' was Mr. N. HERBERT, who at the time was Private Secretary to the then President of the Local Government Board. Hadden, Best & Co. have secured for the present work the services of a gentleman who, from his official position, has throughout his career, and particularly during the last twelve months, had his mind steeped in every branch of the subject, but who by the rules of the Civil Service is prevented from publishing his name. H. B. & Co. have no hesitation in anticipating that the same 'official value' will attach to the present work as to its companion.

The PRIMITIVE CHURCH and the BEE of PETER. By the Rev. LUKE RIVINGTON, M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford. With an Introduction by the CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP of WESTMINSTER. 8vo. 16s.

"The author deals with the theory of the lawful independence of National Churches. He shows that the doctrine set forth by John Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, in his famous letter to King Edward I., as that of the Church of England, was the one taught by the Primitive Church; that the freedom claimed by and granted to the Church was not freedom from the authority of the Pope, but from the lawlessness of kings."—Tablet.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT (TEA-LIKE).

The choicest roasted and broken-up beans of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a fluffy flavoured powder—"COCOAINE," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistency of tea of which it is now beneficially taking the place with many. Its active principle, being a gentle nerve-stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in packets and tins, labelled "JAMES EPPS & CO. (LTD.), Homeopathic Chemists, London."

TWO NEW NOVELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'DODO.'
THE RUBICON.

By E. F. BENSON.

Third Edition, 2 vols.

"We congratulate Mr. Benson upon an exceptional achievement. He has conceived and executed successfully an analytical study of modern life in which a certain salt of humour serves, at least, to keep the pages wholesome. The change and fusion of character amid the fires of passion have been rightly felt and justly depicted from the beginning, events have fallen out in a natural sequence, and the whole story conveys an impression of reality. The book is a notable advance upon Mr. Benson's previous work."—National Observer.

THE RUBICON.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'DODO.'

"The anticipations which must have been formed by all readers of 'Dodo' will in nowise be disappointed by 'The Rubicon.' The new work is well written, stimulating, unconventional, and, in a word, characteristic. Intellectual force is never absent, and the keen observation and knowledge of character, of which there is abundant evidence, are aided by real literary power."—Hirmingham Post.

THE RUBICON.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'DODO.'

"The novel is thoroughly amusing. Mr. Benson knows society thoroughly, and his society people's speeches, epigrams, their aims and ambitions, as set forth by his able and sarcastic pen, are thoroughly up-to-date and convincing."—Black and White.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
'A GENTLEMAN OF FRANCE.'UNDER THE RED ROBE.

Crown 8vo. 2 vols.

"A book of which we have read every word for the sheer pleasure of reading, and which we put down with a pang that we cannot forget it all and start again. It is, indeed, a most ingenious and excellent story, written with that care and unflinching sense of style which we have grown to expect from this writer."—Westminster Gazette.

UNDER the RED ROBE.

By STANLEY WEYMAN.

"An extremely attractive and well-written story, which enchains one's interest from beginning to end. A genuine romance."—Daily Telegraph.

"Everybody who reads books at all must read this thrilling romance. From the first page to the last the breathless reader is haled along. The book is an inspiration of manliness and courage."—Daily Chronicle.

UNDER the RED ROBE.

"The story is full of strong situations and the interest never flags. In his hero the author has given us a character not to be forgotten."—North British Daily Mail.

UNDER the RED ROBE.

By STANLEY WEYMAN.

"A delightful tale of chivalry and adventure. Vivid and dramatic, with a wholesome modesty and reverence for the highest, the book is refreshing indeed."—Globe.

CLIMBING and EXPLORATION in the KARAKORAM-HIMALAYAS. By WILLIAM MARTIN CONWAY, M.A. F.S.A. F.R.G.S. With 300 Illustrations by A. D. McCormick, and a Map. In 1 vol. super-royal 8vo. 738 pp. cloth, gilt top, 31s. 6d. net.

TIMES.
"Mr. Conway's volume is a splendid record of a daring and adventurous scientific expedition. What Mr. Whymper did for the Northern Andes, Mr. Conway has done for the Karakoram-Himalayas."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.
"This stately volume is the worthy record of a splendid journey. The book is not merely the narrative of the best organized and most successful mountaineering expedition as yet made, it is a most valuable and minute account, based on first-hand evidence, of a most fascinating region of the heaven-scarred Himalayas. The book is beautifully and very accurately printed. It is admirably furnished with illustrations. These set before our eyes a most fascinating gallery of sky-piercing summits."

STANDARD (Leader).
"It would be difficult to say which of the many classes of readers who will welcome the work will find most enjoyment in its fascinating pages. Mr. Conway's pen and Mr. McCormick's pencil have made their countrymen partners in their pleasure."

DAILY NEWS.
"It would be hard to say too much in praise of this superb work. As a record of mountaineering it is almost, if not quite, unique. Among records of Himalayan exploration it certainly stands alone. The further Himalayas have never been so faithfully—in other words so poetically—presented as in the masterly delicate sketches with which Mr. McCormick has adorned this book."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.
"Mr. Conway's book will live, and it deserves to live, for it is a graphic record of good work done; of difficulties overcome by pluck, judgment, and determination; of adventure in an almost new country; of novel mountaineering experiences all set forth with extreme literary skill."

MR. EDWARD WHYMPER in the DAILY CHRONICLE.
"The handsome volume is an important addition to the literature of mountaineering, and it will long hold a chief place in the affections of those whose hearts are in the mountains. There is an illustration upon almost every other page, and the matter is interesting and entertaining throughout."

H. GREVEL & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Just published and at all the Libraries, LETTERS OF FRANZ LISZT.

Edited and Collected by LA MARA.

Translated by CONSTANCE BACHE.

Vol. I. Years of Travel as Virtuoso. With a Portrait.
Vol. II. From Home to the End. With a Frontispiece.

2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, price 11. 8s.

"Between six and seven hundred letters, every one of which is worth reading, are reproduced in this collection, and are lavishly supplemented by chronological and explanatory notes, which render the book extremely valuable to musicians and men of letters as a work of reference. Its technical production, moreover, is in every respect exemplary."—Daily Telegraph.

"The translation is from the pen of Miss Constance Bache, sister of the late Walter Bache, who has performed with skill and care what has evidently been for her a labour of love."—Globe.

"In every page of the two volumes there is some reference to a distinguished musician of the past or present."

Daily Chronicle.

"The book will prove a quarry to the judicious biographer in coming days."—Standard.

"The great pianist's wide sympathies, unflinching courtesy, not unrelieved by pungent wit, make the letters especially pleasant reading."—Times.

"There is nothing more to be said of these letters but that their publication in English will be very welcome to a large circle, and that Miss Bache has completed her labour of love with her usual ability."—St. James's Gazette.

WAGNER AND HIS WORKS: The Story of his Life, with Critical Comments.

By HENRY T. FINCK.

With 2 Portraits. 3 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 11. 1s.

"Mr. Finck has undoubtedly enriched the literature of music with a book of sterling worth."—Morning Post.

"Mr. Finck has an exhaustive acquaintance with all the works on the subject, he has Wagner's own works at his fingers' ends, and he has shown remarkable ability in digesting and summarizing his plethora of material. More than that, his comments are expressed in a lively and entertaining style."—Critic.

"Mr. Finck's work is, perhaps, the most exhaustive and appreciative account of the great composer that has appeared in the English language."—Times.

PRESS OPINIONS.

Manchester Guardian.—"Mr. Maude writes well, with a power of representing lifelike figures and movements."

Athenæum.—"A good story, and strong characters..... Deserves infinite credit."

National Observer.—"The author, to sum up, has proved that he is a clever and thoughtful person."

Morning Post.—"It is cleverly written."

Daily News.—"A fine study of an unhappy man."

Spectator.—"Fashionable horrors—realistic—fin de siècle."

Truth.—"Though of the kind in vogue..... is the reverse of prurient..... A wholesome novel."

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON'S NEW BOOKS.

Vol. I. published this day simultaneously in London, Paris, and New York,

MEMOIRS to serve for the HISTORY of NAPOLEON I. From 1802 to 1815. By his Private Secretary, BARON CLAUDE FRANÇOIS DE MÉNEVAL, Officer of the Legion of Honour and of the Order of the Iron Crown. The Work completed by the addition of hitherto Unpublished Documents. Edited and Arranged by BARON JOSEPH ERNEST DE MÉNEVAL (Grandson of the Author). Translated and fully Annotated by ROBERT H. SHERARD. In 3 vols. demy 8vo. cloth gilt and gilt top (about 1400 pages), with Autograph Letters and Photogravure Portraits. Price 18s. per volume.

•• Vols. II. and III. will follow immediately.

The GREEN BAY TREE: a Tale of To-day. In 3 vols. By W. H. WILKINS and HERBERT VIVIAN.

PUNCH says:—"The Green Bay Tree" is truly a tale of to-day. It is all smartly done. No flagging on any page of the three volumes, with here and there powerfully delineated episodes. Those who live in London Society to-day will fancy they recognize familiar faces flitting through the book."

The NATIONAL OBSERVER says:—"The Green Bay Tree" is sure to flourish. It has the elements of success, and many points of interest. It is the first product of a new literary partnership between two clever young writers. It is a new venture in a field that, for the present, lacks workers, the field that was Disraeli's, of the novel of political and social satire. And it has the Disraelitish quality, the vivacity and sparkle, to say nothing of the engaging impudence of the young Disraeli. The verve and go of the social portraiture, the variety and vivacity of the scenes are most refreshing, and there is undeniable vigour and cleverness in the movement and talk."

A Twelfth and Cheap Edition of 'A YELLOW ASTER' (completing Seventeenth Thousand) will be ready immediately. In crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 6s.

A HUNTED LIFE. An Episode. In 3 vols. By J. Fogerty, Author of 'The Countess Irene,' 'Juanita,' &c. [This day.]

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'STILL LIFE OF THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.'

MIDDLE TEMPLE TABLE TALK. By W. G. Thorpe, F.S.A., a Barrister of the Society. In demy 8vo. cloth gilt, with Photogravure Portrait of the Author. 15s.

TIMES.—"He has a copious fund of anecdote, and a lively vein of humour."

SCOTSMAN.—"Will keep many a busy man up late to finish it."

GLOBE.—"His keen sense of the humorous, his broad sympathies, all endear him and his pages to the reader."

A PRECIOUS SCAMP. In 3 vols. By Henry Cresswell, Author of 'A Woman's Ambition,' 'Broken Fortunes,' 'A Willy Widow,' &c. [Next week at all Libraries.]

NEW STORY OF INDIAN ADVENTURE.

The TEMPLE of DEATH. By Edmund Mitchell. In crown 8vo. cloth gilt, with Frontispiece by G. H. Edwards, 6s.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"The unfolding of the plot never flags, and the action is continually intensified until the final climax is reached. The incidents are thrilling, and the local colouring admirably interwoven with the narrative. Few people who are well launched into the book will want to leave it unfinished."

LEEDS MERCURY.—"In point of style, in capacity for picturesque and vivid description, in powerful imagination, in skilful construction and development of plot, Mr. Mitchell shows himself a story-teller not unworthy to take rank with veteran favourites."

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'I FORBID THE BANNS.'

A JOURNALIST'S NOTE-BOOK. By Frankfort Moore. In demy 8vo. cloth, gilt top, with Photogravure Portrait of the Author, 12s.

The TIMES says:—"The author is a raconteur of undeniable humour. Unquestionably those in search of a racy and entertaining book will find something to satisfy them in Mr. Moore's volume."

The SATURDAY REVIEW says:—"From beginning to end it is capital reading, and full of excellent stories."

NEW VOLUME OF HUTCHINSON'S SELECT NOVELS.

A MARRIAGE CEREMONY. By Ada Cambridge. In crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The WORLD says:—"One of the most readable novels of the season."

London: HUTCHINSON & CO. Paternoster-row.

DIGBY, LONG & CO.

NOTICE.—The SECOND EDITION of JEAN MIDDLEMASS'S powerful Novel, 'The MYSTERY of CLEMENT DUNRAVEN,' is now ready, in 3 vols., at every Library.

The SCOTSMAN'S Opinion.

"The development of the plot and the story is skilful and of absorbing interest. The end is distinctly dramatic, and marks the story as one of considerable power."

The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE Opinion.

"Distinctly good reading. Rivets all one's interest as do very few of the plotless and slipshod effusions of this generation."

HARPER'S MAGAZINE. June.

The famous Correspondent of the Times, M. DE BLOWITZ, contributes French Diplomacy under the Third Republic, in which he gives wholly novel personal sketches of the eminent ministers who have represented France at London, Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg, including the narration of episodes not hitherto brought to public notice, and a masterly review of the ideas and influences that during this period have controlled French diplomacy.

ALFRED PARSONS contributes an Article entitled A Japanese Spring, with Twenty-three Illustrations from his own Drawings. This is the first of a number of papers by this distinguished artist, prepared by him during his recent sojourn in Japan, undertaken especially for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

GEORGE DU MAURIER's delightful Novel, Trilby, maintains the remarkable interest which it has all along evoked, and is richly illustrated, containing Fifteen Engravings from the Author's Drawings.

And many other attractive features.

A MANUAL of MICROCHEMICAL ANALYSIS. By Prof. H.

BEHRENS, of the Polytechnic School in Delft, Holland. With an Introductory Chapter by J. W. JUDD, F.R.S., Professor of Geology at the Royal College of Science. With 84 Illustrations drawn by the Author. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"Prof. Judd has done good service to students of a very interesting branch of geology by introducing to them Prof. H. Behrens's 'Manual of Microchemical Analysis' in English dress. The book contains a remarkably clear account of the methods by means of which very minute quantities of mineral substances can be subjected to chemical tests, and their character recognized."

CHEMICAL NEWS.—"Prof. Behrens is an exceedingly accurate and delicate worker, and the student who follows his instructions will not be led astray. The work well deserves to be strongly recommended."

NEW LIBRARY NOVELS.

A DAUGHTER of TO-DAY. By Sara JEANETTE DUNCAN. Author of 'A Social Departure.' 2 vols.

"A terrible satire on certain aspects of 'the revolting daughter.'"—Daily Telegraph.

IN the FACE of the WORLD. By ALAN ST. AUBYN. Author of 'A Fellow of Trinity.' 2 vols.

"The author of 'The Junior Dean' comes back to his first form and surpasses himself in interest in his new novel. Alan St. Aubyn writes as a skilled and conscientious artist, who has not only a purpose to serve, but a story to tell, and who does both with success."—World.

JACK DOYLE'S DAUGHTER. By R. E. FRANCESILLON. Author of 'Ropes of Sand.' 3 vols.

"Mr. Francesillon long ago conquered the secret of a readable novel, and his latest book shows that his hand has not lost its cunning. The story is bright and amusing. It is, in fact, a racy book."—Leeds Mercury.

DOROTHY'S DOUBLE. By G. A. HENTY. Author of 'Rajah the Juggler.' 3 vols.

"Mr. Henty is a past-master in the art of concocting the story of incident, and we could hardly wish for a better example of this particular order in fiction than he has provided for us in 'Dorothy's Double.' A thoroughly interesting and readable story."—Speaker.

SAINT ANN'S. By W. E. NORRIS. 2 vols. Second Edition.

"Mr. Norris has more than once been called the Thackeray of our generation. In 'Saint Ann's' he gives us one of his usual pleasant and airy love stories. His entertainment is always agreeable, and those who pay their money at the door of 'Saint Ann's' will sit it out with pleasure to the close."—Glasgow Herald.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

MR. SADLER'S DAUGHTERS. By Hugh COLEMAN DAVISON. With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood.

The RED SHIRTS: a Tale of the Terror. By PAUL GAULAY. Translated by J. A. DE VILLIERS. With a Frontispiece.

TOM SAWYER ABROAD. By Mark Twain. With 28 Illustrations by Ian Bead.

"Tom Sawyer Abroad, with its Jabbo-Vernon-like invention and quaint oddity of thought and expression, ought to be an especial delight to boy-readers."—Daily News.

The REBEL QUEEN. By Walter Besant. With a Frontispiece by A. H. R. Roberts.

"The Rebel Queen is a remarkably work. It is fascinating as a fiction and it is instructive and suggestive as a study in sociology to an extent which is not to be taken in at a first reading."—World.

MONEY. By Emile Zola, Author of 'The Invention.' Translated with a Preface, by E. A. VIENETTES.

"No one will be able to read 'Money' without a deep sense of its absolute truth. Everything in the novel is on a grand scale. A vast panorama of national vicissitudes. An overpowering presentation of the disaster wrought by the unbridled race for wealth."—Morning Leader.

VASHTI and ESTHER: a Story of Society. To-day. By 'MELLY' of the World.

"Vashti and Esther will give the cap-differs plenty to do, for it is full of types, if not of people. It is a clever book, written by one who knows; who will be voted daring, no doubt—even andodious."—Vanity Fair.

A DOG and HIS SHADOW. By R. E. FRANCESILLON.

"In 'A Dog and His Shadow' we have a study of a man and his circumstances that in depth of the human mind, might have satisfied George Meredith. 'A Dog and His Shadow' has a wealth of character study and playfully distinguished."—Morning Leader.

A PROTEGÉE of JACK HAMLIN'S, &c. By BERT HART. With 28 Illustrations.

"Distinguished by that indefinable something which passes for 'quality,' and such an admirable way of seeing things and seeing the character as no other living writer quite commands."—Westminster Gazette.

NEW NOVELS.

SHALLOWS. By Myra Swan.
3 vols.

MARY FENWICK'S DAUGHTER.
By BEATRICE WHITEY, Author of 'The Awakening of Mary Fenwick,' 'One Reason Why,' &c. 3 vols.

The FOOL of DESTINY. By Colin MIDDLETON, Author of 'Lance of Maltravers,' 3 vols.

The HUSBAND of ONE WIFE. By Mrs. VENN, Author of 'Some Married Fellows,' &c. 3 vols.

"The theme is a good one, but one requiring delicate handling. Mrs. Venn has treated it excellently, so much so that the interest increases instead of diminishing as she proceeds, and the third volume, in our opinion, is much the best of the lot. 'The Husband of One Wife' is good work, and its personal may safely be recommended."—London Advertiser.

ORCHARD DAMEREL. By Alan ST. AUBYN, Author of 'A Fellow of Trinity,' &c. 3 vols.

"Taken altogether, the work is the strongest that has come from the author's pen, and does not gain its strength by any abandonment of the peculiar refinement which characterises this writer's books. It is a thoroughly enjoyable story."—Scotsman.

JANET DELILLE. By E. N. Leigh
FIVE, Author of 'A Scotch Tale,' &c. 3 vols.

"We like Janet Delille's novel, and no reader will feel his time wasted in perusing it, which cannot in truth be said of most novels."—London Herald.

IN CUPID'S COLLEGE. By Mabel HART, Author of 'Two English Girls,' 'From Harvest to Haytime,' &c. 3 vols.

"The writing is always bright and pleasant, the dialogue is natural and characteristic, and some of the situations are exceedingly pathetic. 'In Cupid's College' is well above the average novel in tone, in feeling, and in writing."—Lancet.

LITERATURE

Climbing and Exploration in the Karakoram-Himalayas. By William Martin Conway. (Fisher Unwin.)

UNDER a title which hardly raises more expectation than the merest "mountain gymnast" might be able to satisfy, Mr. Conway has produced a book which will, we venture to predict, take a very high place among the literature of travel of our time, and be read with pleasure when Gilgit and Nagyr are even as Brieg and Zermatt.

Of books of travel there are several kinds, capable, like so much else, of classification under the heads of σπουδαίοι and φαιλοί. The latter again fall into two main subdivisions—books written by people who can write, and books written by people who cannot. It would be invidious to name names; but everybody can supply them. We all know the newspaper paragraph which tells us that some popular journalist is about to spend the winter in South Africa, or Japan, or Patagonia; and we all know, alas! the columns of easy reporting (at per thousand words) which the journal that he adorns will inflict upon its readers during his absence. Also we know the octavo volumes of the Hon. Percy Popjoy—or, as is nowadays more usual, the Hon. Mrs. Percy; published at thirty-two shillings, and before a year is out sold at three. The political traveller, who goes in search of facts to support the opinions which he has already adopted, is more difficult to class. He is often σπουδαίος enough, in the sense that he is in a hurry, but that is not what it means in this collocation. His treatment of facts, and oftentimes his language with regard to other nations, would seem to justify us in assigning him to a class of his own, as the βίαιος. The scientific traveller who goes to Ruwenzori in search of Hemiptera is a far more estimable person; but as he seldom writes save in Transactions or Proceedings, he does not concern us here.

But of the men who write books that stimulate the reader's intelligence, that teach him something, that deserve to live on our bookshelves, and be read once and again, there are likewise two kinds: those who report and those who reflect. Of course, no one book can be exclusively referred in all its details to either of these classes; but the general distinction will we think be admitted. The former requires the faculties of observation and clear statement; the latter demands rather social experience and literary culture. As we write, our eyes light upon two volumes standing almost side by side on their shelf, which may serve as examples of the two classes: Cooper's 'Travels of a Pioneer of Commerce' and 'Eothen.' Mr. Cooper was not a man of any scholarly attainments; he had not read many of the masterpieces of literature; he had no views on art, no theories in science. But, owing no doubt to his dauntless courage and his amiable disposition, he had the faculty of keeping his eyes open and his head cool in all circumstances, and of seeing what was going on around him; and being a clear-sighted and straightforward man, he was able to give a clear and trustworthy report, so that his book may be read with pleasure even by persons who take no special interest in China and the parts adjacent, but simply care for a narrative of adventure told without any pretence of literary ornament. In 'Eothen,' on the other hand, we have the impressions of a highly cultivated man of the world among scenes new to him, indeed, but described scores of times, and familiar to hundreds of people. We read it, not to learn what he saw, but rather what he thought of it, or, still more, for the mere enjoyment of his manner of recounting it.

Now Mr. Conway has the advantage of doubling these parts. On one side of him he is—we have his own word for it in print, or we should not venture to trespass so far on the domain of the "New Journalism"—

"a dolichocephalous black man, one of that small dark stock that always has to go under before the ruddy brachycephalous Saxon Philistine..... a lover of discomfort, of ill-ventilated huts and open-air campings out, of ragged and unkempt attire, a lost wanderer from a prehistoric age, condemned to live unwillingly amidst a clean and shaven race."

But in addition to this he is a man of letters, a student (and a teacher, too) of art, a scholar in several languages; one, too, who knows the Latin names of plants, and the use of the theodolite and plane-table. From him therefore, if from any one, the world had a right to expect a book that should combine accurate observation and intelligible reporting with an original and acute record of impressions. Nor will the world have any reason to be disappointed.

There is no need to say much about the journey out, or the doings of the party at Abbottabad and Srinagar, though Mr. Conway's remarks on the much vaunted scenery of Kashmir are piquant. He says:

"After all, Kashmir is not comparable to the Italian lake district for natural beauty. It is a country in which nature awaits the help of man. The views become admirable when employed as backgrounds for architecture, or at least horticulture. Gardens are needed to enframe them, pavilions to command them. But Nature at once accepts and blesses such works of man, and the commonest painted wooden erection, if of good proportion, looks finer among the orchards by the Dal Lake than palaces of marble would appear in London. Pour the wealth of a metropolis into Kashmir, and you might make a paradise impossible elsewhere."

The last clause is ambiguous; but the general purport of the passage is clear, and it is, we suspect, true of a good deal of scenery besides that of the "Happy Valley." On the whole, Mr. Conway's impressions of Srinagar, though quite good-tempered, do not kindle in the reader's mind any great wish to see it, at all events till he has seen a good many other places.

From their quarters above Srinagar they travelled a day's journey in boats down the Jhelam; and here we get the first touch of Mr. Conway's delightful Gurkha contingent. Some of these choery and plucky little men had been selected by Lieut. Bruce, who was of the party, from his regiment the 5th Gurkhas, to accompany the expedition, and most valuable members of it they proved themselves:—

"A few minutes before nine o'clock we began drifting down the river in the still moonlight. We were all in fine spirits, scarcely harmonious, however, with the mood of the night. We sang too rowdily, I fear; the poplar avenue having to echo back the strains of 'Tarara-boom-deay,' and I know not what other ribald ditties. Parbir excited the envy of his comrades, Lila Ram and Amar Sing, with 'Two Lovely Black Eyes,' which he had picked up in England. Zurbriggen contributed his native jodel to the general din. Our enthusiasm wore itself out as we entered the city. Lila Ram summed up his impressions of Srinagar in a brief sentence: 'A good big place, but damned dirty.' Parbir remarked: 'Me, Nepal, say, Kashmir woman good, Kashmir house good, Kashmir dirty.'"

Two days later (April 15th) the party left the plain at Bandipur, and took the new road to Gilgit.

"Our caravan was composed as follows. There were seven Europeans—Bruce, Dickin, McCormick, Roudebush, Eckenstein, Zurbriggen, and myself; three Gurkhas—Parbir, Lila Ram, and Amar Sing; three servants—Rahim Ali (the head man), Habiba (Roudebush's bearer), and Jumma Khan (Dickin's bearer); two shikaris—Salama (Roudebush's) and Shuhbana (Bruce's); seven naukars (coolies who carried light loads and made themselves generally useful); forty-five expedition coolies; sixteen coolies for Dickin's things; sixteen coolies for Roudebush's; and five coolies carrying Government stores for the Gilgit garrison—total 104 men."

At Guraia, their first halting-place, was the shrine of a Moslem saint. Mr. Conway made inquiries about it of the inhabitants, and was told it was Baba Darbeesh's tomb:

"That is where he slept the night he first came to Guraia. No one may go in there, nor may any one alter anything. If they did, it would bring evil on the folk of Guraia. They would lose their goods and suffer much harm. 'I only looked in; I did not go in.' 'What you did was no harm. Durand Sahib pitched his tent within the wall, and he too looked in, and he gave the village much bakshish, and no one minded at all'—a pretty broad hint."

Before Gilgit was reached a pass 13,500 ft. high had to be crossed. The snow lay deep, and more fell; so that the leaders of the little army had some difficulty in getting their followers over. That night the only place free from snow, on which they could pitch their tent, was the flat roof of a hut. After this they began to come in sight of the giants, the first to show himself being the mighty Nanga Parbat (26,600 ft.). On May 2nd, crossing a low spur, they entered the Indus valley, noticing "signs of disintegration on a large scale" in the ground, which portend another landslip, and consequent blocking of the Indus, such as has before now caused disastrous inundations in the Punjab. They stopped to press flowers.

"Whilist McCormick and I were thus engaged Parbir passed by gaily whistling. His coat was hitched through the belt of his forage sack, the wings of his waistcoat flapped about in the breeze, Bruce's gun was slung across his back, his blue umbrella was tucked under his arm, and he carried an ice-axe on his shoulder; his head was crowned with his own cap, and Zurbiggen's tope above it. There was always a cheery moment when Parbir came along."

At Gilgit the actual mountaineering began, and, it may be said, the exploration; for though Col. Godwin-Austen had surveyed the Karakoram range thirty years before, the resulting map was executed by people who had no practical knowledge of mountains, and was consequently of little value in the glacier regions. A few years ago, too, Capt. Younghusband made an adventurous passage over the range on his way from Turkestan, and visited the great Baltoro and Punmar glaciers. But for all practical purposes the ranges from which flow the tributaries of these and the still larger Hispar glacier were little better than a terra incognita. As it lies in close proximity to that strange no man's land "where three Empires" just do not "meet," it has an importance from another than the touristic point of view; and the time may come when the germs of mountain-craft implanted by Mr. Conway and Mr. Bruce in their Gurkha followers will bear valuable fruit. Hill-mon by nature, the Gurkhas soon developed into excellent mountaineers. Another one joined the party at Gilgit, Karbir by name; and soon after, Lila Ram being ill, his place was taken by Harkbir of the same regiment—"the admirable Harkbir," as Mr. Conway loves to call him. The passage in which he is introduced deserves quotation, as showing the kind of material which we have at our disposal in India; and also, incidentally, as showing that in Mr. Conway we have an observer of men a whole heaven removed from the ordinary globe-trotter, to whom one dark face is as another, and their owners all "niggers," or at best "natives," alike:—

"Bruce's choice fell upon Harkbir Thapa, a sepoy of his regiment, who earned distinction at Nilt and was rewarded with the Order of Merit. A better choice could not have been made. He attached himself particularly to me, and always walked with me, carrying the plane-table and photographic things. He was remarkably intelligent; he taught himself by mere observation how to set up, level, and orient the table, and the tricks of the various cameras. He was an admirable companion, and we soon became the best and most inseparable of friends. I can find no words too high to express my appreciation of him. He lacked Parbir's joyous spirits, but he possessed a fund of quiet good sense and excellent feeling, rare among men of any nationality. Like all Gurkhas he was perfectly brave, but he was likewise humane. He was the first to notice if a coolie was ill, and to give him a helping hand or relieve him of his burden. In snowy regions he would deprive me of my waterproof tent floor to make the coolies comfortable—a duty I learnt to leave to him. But they never imposed upon him by shamming. He did his duty, and expected other men to do theirs."

While we are on the subject of the native followers, we ought not to omit Rahim Ali, the head man, or (if there had been any domus) the major-domo to the party. Of him we read that "it seemed a point of honour with Rahim Ali to feed us best when we were in the worst places. On the 14th [August] it snowed all day, so he kept serving us with hot meals and continual supplies of soup or tea at intervals to fill up the time.....He gave us hot fresh herrings for breakfast, chops and a sweet omelette for lunch, soup, a joint, and scrambled eggs for dinner. He produced each dish with the grin of a conjuror. [N.B. This was at "Junction Camp," just ninety feet higher than the summit of Mont Blanc.] He always had a way of coming to me and asking, 'When would you like to have dinner?' In the early days of the journey I used to answer, as suited our convenience, 'In half an hour' or 'In an hour.' I soon noticed that such answers depressed him, and were not what he expected. I was intended to answer 'Now.' Then he would smile and say, 'It's quite ready.'"

Evidently Himalayan travel has its compensations. But the East always was the land of magic. Can Rahim Ali have been a Mahatma?

Sed fugit interea, fugit irreparabile tempus, Singula dum capiti circumvestiatur amore.

There is so much to talk about in Mr. Conway's book that the limits of a review article would soon be exceeded if we were to continue at this rate. Fortunately the mountaineering part proper has already been related, at all events in a summarized form, in the Geographical Journal, the Alpine Journal, the Times, and other easily accessible organs of information. Everybody who cares about such things knows that Mr. Conway crossed the Hispar Pass, a matter of nearly a fortnight's march over some seventy miles of glacier, up and down; that he reached the head of the Baltoro glacier, and stood under the mighty "K 2," the second in height of all measured peaks; that he beheld Masherbrum and Gasherbrum—the meaning of these names is not a bit like the sound—it's only less mighty satellites; and that he climbed what, though merely a secondary summit of one of the lesser mountains of the group, is the highest point of the earth's surface ever trodden by human foot.

We have said nothing about Mr. McCormick's illustrations. Those who have seen and admired the original water colours will find that they suffer from translation into black and white, and reproduction by "process." Those in which there is most snow have come out the best. The pen-and-ink drawings (if such they be) seem to us the most satisfactory of all, at all events in the lower regions, where buildings and trees have to be represented. But even at their best they compare unfavourably, as book illustrations, with Mr. Whympers's wood-blocks, and the glaze on the paper—bad paper, too—essential to the proper execution of "process" blocks, forms a serious drawback to the comfort with which the volume can be read by lamplight.

Select Statutes and other Constitutional Documents illustrative of the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Edited by G. W. Prothero, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

It is a very good sign that the quality of the higher historical teaching in this country is rapidly improving that there should be a demand for books of the sort now before us. Probably the 'Select Charters' of the Bishop of Oxford has done more than any other single book to teach the undergraduate and student the real nature of historical authority and the true character of historical evidence. Mr. S. R. Gardiner's more recent 'Constitutional Documents of the Puritan Revolution' has done admirable service in the same direction with regard to a later period. And now Mr. Prothero's volume comes as a "contribution towards bridging up the gap" between them. We hope that the good work may be persevered in, and that the reception given to this book may encourage the publishers to "fill up the gap" between the volume of Mr. Prothero and Dr. Stubbs's 'Select Charters.' We must regret, however, that a piece of bad management somewhere has still left a little gap between Mr. Prothero and Mr. Gardiner. The former book stops in 1625 with James I.'s death; the first document contained in the latter is the Petition of Right of 1628. Thus three important years have been omitted.

Mr. Prothero has chosen his documents with great care, and has plainly taken considerable pains to secure good texts. Although perhaps the majority of the pieces printed come from ordinary sources like the Statute Book, Strype, Rymer, D'Ewes, &c., a considerable number are printed directly from the manuscripts, and not a few see the light for the first time. In this relation we must specially praise the complete texts of six commissions, dating between 1559 and 1601, which set up the various courts of High Commission that from Whitgift's time onwards proved such a terror to Puritans and sectaries. Mr. Prothero cannot find the commission of 1583 issued at the time of Whitgift's appointment, but he shows clearly that the notion of Hallam that that commission marked a new starting-point in the history of the court is erroneous, and that the chief powers exercised by it were conferred on it even in the first commission of 1559. In another place Mr. Prothero's documents enable him to correct Hallam by showing that the clerical benevolence of 1587 was not, as the Whig historian thought, exacted without the constitutional sanction of a grant by Convocation.

Mr. Prothero has departed from the simple chronological arrangement of Mr. Gardiner, and divides his documents into subjects. The plan possesses its obvious conveniences, but it leads to some cross divisions. It is a little puzzling to find the Act of Uniformity, which is put under "Statutes," far separated from the "Ecclesiastical Documents"; but a careful and clear table of contents and a full and good index much facilitate the work of reference. In the headings which Mr. Prothero has affixed to his text we have only been able to discover one little slip—on p. 421, where a circular dated December, 1604, is assigned to Archbishop Whitgift, though the date alone, to say nothing of the signature, "R. Cantuar.," shows that Bancroft, and not Whitgift, was the prelate who issued it.

Mr. Prothero has written a long introduction to his texts, which is a model of careful, scholarly, and patient work. Some few parts are, perhaps, somewhat wanting in emphasis and light and shade. But we have never seen the true doctrine that James I.'s reign is from most points of view a continuation of that of Elizabeth rather than the beginning of a new period put more clearly than it is by Mr. Prothero. Moreover, we must heartily praise the lucid way in which he shows how the parliamentary system, far from being repressed under the Tudors, was favoured systematically by those popular despots, who thus forged the weapons that ultimately destroyed their successors on the throne. But what is really most necessary in such a book is a close and accurate statement that really does introduce the documents to the reader, and Mr. Prothero's work, if only by reason of his constant references to his texts, supplies just the sort of help that the real student wants. Sometimes we seem to notice the disadvantages of the method of working backwards which the Clarendon Press has adopted in connecting this book with its fellows. But under these circumstances Mr. Prothero is quite right to say a little about the origin of some of the institutions whose work is illustrated in his documents. His account of the origin of the Star Chamber, in spite of being short, is admirably clear and to the point, but it is a pity that he has taken no pains to trace the origin of the Council of Wales and the Marches, contenting himself with the statement that, though confirmed by Act of Parliament in 1542, that court existed previously. It would not have taken long to point out how the court gradually developed from being the personal council of the household of the Prince or Princess of Wales, the custodians of their persons, and the administrators of their domains and principality, until it became a permanent local tribunal which did the good service of first making the Principality and Marches a peaceable and orderly country to live in. Moreover, it was not merely the condition of the Welsh border that necessitated the creation of the court. All Wales, Principality and Marches alike (and the Welsh Marches were not simply the borders), was equally disturbed, and this not simply because Welshmen were half-civilized or even "half-conquered," but because of the impossibility of enforcing any law, owing to the clashing of the petty feudal jurisdictions of the Lords Marchers, that, until Henry VIII.'s great measures of reform, kept Wales from any real prospect of peace and good laws. But Mr. Prothero might, perhaps, answer that these questions would have carried him too far from his period. On other points we have nothing but unqualified praise for his scholarly work, and our only complaint here is caused by a possible fault of omission.

Early Editions: a Bibliographical Survey of the Works of some Popular Modern Authors.
By J. H. Slater. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

MR. SLATER's well-earned reputation as a bibliographer and student of the fluctuations of the book-market may not be materially enhanced by this new work, but it will serve to carry the volume far and wide among the ever-increasing multitude of English and American collectors; and although the limits he has imposed on himself—"some popular modern authors"—will cause disappointment here and there, the selection has been made in so catholic a spirit that the grumblers, on that score at least, will not be numerous. The circle of "fashionable" authors (which would have been a designation more strictly technical than "popular") is being furnished daily with new recruits, partly through the widening of taste among collectors, and partly through the intelligent efforts of the dealers, who make it their business to provide their customers with new tastes. The mob comprehensively known as "book-collectors" is composed of almost as many varieties as of individuals, but it may be divided roughly into two bands—one of which cares mainly for the outside and the other for the inside of a book. The two companies intermingle so much, it is true, that no sharp line can be drawn, but the old reproach levelled at the bibliomaniac suspected of reading his books has become obsolete. Nowadays he is expected to pretend that he reads the books he buys, even when he happens to be a votary of the éditions de luxe, a pleasure one would imagine to be confined mainly to the physically robust.

The most respectable class of collectors, and therefore the smallest, is composed of those who buy solely for purposes of reading or study. They desire the possession of first and early out-of-print editions of good authors, partly for the sake of the interest which such things have for all intelligent persons, and partly that they may be able to trace the development of an author's mind and taste. Happy are they who filled their shelves with such treasures before the shops and stalls began to be harried by more bric-à-brac collectors, the horde which had hitherto satisfied itself with china, or violins, or snuff-boxes, or "the tobacco pipes of all nations." Not less happy they who, beginning with the properest of motives, have succeeded in preserving their virgin tastes unsmirched by the vulgarities of mere curiosity hunting. If the ruthless competition of the long-pursed barbarian has hampered the poor student in the exercise of his legitimate tastes, let him seek compensation in the fact that the same competitor has served to check the free indulgence of those which are illegitimate. To some extent it is doubtless true that book-hunting has become a rich man's sport, but the extent to which it is true is very limited, for a man may still line his walls with the best books in the best and most "curious" editions for a tenth of the sum he would have to expend if he covered them with tolerable paintings, or with the choicest engravings or etchings. Truly, the collecting of rare editions is no longer what it was a quarter of a century ago—the game, at all events, is no longer so plentiful at the stalls; but it is still a sport suited to comparatively moderate purses, and even the poorest man who knows his way about gets stray shots which bring to his cheek a glow of pleasure unknown to his brother whose game is driven past his gun by the professional beater.

A glance at Mr. Slater's list of "Contents" shows that it is mainly for the bric-à-brac collector that he has catered, for of the thirty-two names it comprises, less than a moiety have produced works which have the least chance of taking a permanent place in literature; and of the remainder a painfully large proportion have nothing whatever to do with literature, properly so called. The books of such authors as Albert Smith, William Combe ("Dr. Syntax"), Pierce Egan, and some others in Mr. Slater's selection, are collected solely for the sake of the illustrations to which they are attached, and should properly have been entered under the names of Leech, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, and so forth, or, better still, have been omitted altogether, and reserved for a treatise on book-illustrators. The list, too, is burdened with the names of no fewer than ten living authors, all of whose works which possess the slightest importance, and most of whose "editions," are easily procurable—a superfluity for which not Mr. Slater, but the absurdities of the bric-à-brac bookman must be held chargeable.

The essentially unliterary character of the traffic in "editions" is made clear, not only by the inclusion of the names above mentioned, but by the omission of all those which had glorified English literature before the middle of last century, and of such shining moderns as Scott, Keats, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Lamb. Of course, the rarer editions of the works of the great ancients and moderns are still collected, and fetch high prices; but Mr. Slater knows his public, and gives place only to "the most popular modern authors"—those most popular, that is, with his clients. It follows, therefore, as a natural consequence, that his list affords a spectacle at once sad and comic; it is as levelling as death or the Post Office Directory—the order running in this fashion: "Burns (Robert); Byron (Lord); Combe (William); Dickens (Charles); Dobson (Austin); Egan (Pierce); Eliot (George)," and so forth. One class of books has been wisely omitted altogether by Mr. Slater, for its inclusion would have made 'Early Editions' scarce before a twelve-month was over. "In this compilation," he writes,

"books published in extremely limited quantities, for the obvious purpose of inducing speculation, have no place. The importance of many of these books is fictitious, and their quoted value illusive."

And he might well have added that their natural gravitation towards the "fourpenny box" has to be arrested by artificial means. Mr. Slater deals only with books for which there is more or less of a real market, and quotes current prices for good and perfect copies—"where auction-values are given," he says, "they are based on a close average, and do not necessarily represent any sum actually realized on any particular occasion." Recent correspondence which has appeared in our columns shows that his estimations have not met with the approval of all collectors. This is not altogether to be wondered at, for so individual is the quality of each copy, and so much does the value depend on minutiae of condition, that the principle of "averaging" is apt to be so misleading that it is hardly applicable at all. Then Mr. Slater tells us that, personally, he does not collect books, and this, we fear, must be taken as a very damaging, if not an absolutely fatal admission. The true, actual value of any commodity is only to be learnt by one who is personally and habitually engaged in the higgling of the market-place. The proverb which teaches us that the looker-on sees the game best may, perhaps, be true of games; it cannot be true of any description of traffic. As regards the book market Mr. Slater is almost if not quite as much an "outsider" as he would be in respect of the Stock Exchange if he depended for his knowledge of the value of speculative shares on "City articles." Real knowledge of the current value of such securities is confined to speculators and their brokers, who are dealing in them from day to day. It is the lack of this personal, practical kind of knowledge which casts an air of unreality over many of Mr. Slater's articles. His knowledge of "points" seems to be considerable, and it often enables him to give useful hints to the young collector, for books have as many technical "points" as the dogs or poultry which are sent to shows. The most conspicuous defect of 'Early Editions' is the want of exact collations to all the items. Collation, exact and exhaustive, is the be-all and end-all of bibliography; prices are so constantly fluctuating that Mr. Slater's quotations will soon be as obsolete as those of 'Lowndes.'

So little attention has been paid to the all-important matter of collation that the "display" of title-pages is not indicated, and even their punctuation is frequently given inaccurately. Mr. Slater cannot have compared the original and the reprint of Browning's 'Pauline' very carefully, for he states that so far as he is aware Mr. Wise's reprint differs only from the original as to the paper (which Mr. Slater says he has seen manipulated so as to look old and mellow) and as to the type of "October" on the last page. As a matter of fact the "leading" of the pages of the two texts differs considerably, and the type used for the reprint, though closely resembling the original, is by no means identical. The title of Browning's 'Strafford' is given with five misprints, and although the description mentions "a label," nothing is said as to what is printed on it. "There is more than one edition," says Mr. Slater, "notably that by Emily H. Hickey.....There is, however, no mistaking the original," &c. Is there really more than one author's separate edition of 'Strafford' (for Miss Hickey's is a school-book)? If so, Mr. Slater might have been expected to describe it. Of 'Bolls and Pomegranates' we are told that "eight distinct and separate poems go to make up a full set." Of course Mr. Slater meant to say parts, not "poems," and forgot to say that there was a "second edition" of No. V.—'A Blot in the 'Scutcheon'—the presence of which, in place of the first, reduces the market value of a set considerably. Of 'Christmas-Eve and Easter-Day'

(Mr. Slater omits the hyphens and the publishers' address) we are told that an American edition appeared in 1886—"Subsequent English editions are unmistakable." If Mr. Slater knows of any such (except in collected form), the dates of their publication should have been given.

Mr. Slater accounts for the high prices fetched by Burns's Kilmarnock 'Poems' by its rarity—"copies are now hardly to be met with in any condition." As a matter of fact, the number of copies known is considerable, and fresh ones turn up not unfrequently; it is rather the multiplicity of compositors which keeps up the price. The article 'Burns' is very inadequately treated, and the same is true of 'Lord Byron' and 'Leigh Hunt.' In the last title given to the Reflector bears no resemblance to that given to it by Hunt, and ends "N.D. (but 1810-12)." As a matter of fact, not only are the four numbers "frequently found bound up in two vols. 8vo.," but each volume has a title-page to itself, and each is duly dated "1811," all the numbers except the first having appeared in that year. "Byron, Hazlitt, and Shelley," says Mr. Slater, "also contributed to its pages"; but as none of the three did so, Mr. Slater has probably confused the Reflector with the Liberal, which he does not mention at all. Although the greater part of Leigh Hunt's life was spent in the production of literary periodicals—the same periodical, one might almost say, under varying names—the Reflector is the only one which finds a place in Mr. Slater's list! Of the books mentioned, 'Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries' is incompletely described, no notice being taken of the portraits contained in both editions. The octavo issue is described inadequately as "a second and better edition," and the market values of both seem to be seriously understated. The title-page of 'The Story of Rimini' is very inaccurately and incompletely reprinted—even the publishers' names being omitted. The fact that Mr. Meredith's 'Evan Harrington' was first published (with illustrations by Charles Keene) in the second and third volumes of Once a Week is ignored, while Mr. C. K. Shorter's interesting edition of 'The Tragic Comedians,' with biographical notices of the actors in the tragic-comedy, is not mentioned. The article 'William Morris' is strangely, but deliberately left incomplete. No collector could have any difficulty in gathering all necessary information with regard to Mr. Morris's principal works; his difficulties would only arise when he began to get together the pamphlets, artistic and socialistic, which have been issued by the poet. These are dismissed by Mr. Slater as, "for various reasons, not of much interest to the collector"! None of the reasons is mentioned, so that it is impossible to estimate them. The account of the works of Dante Rossetti leaves much to be desired. Even as regards so common a book as the 'Poems' (1870) it is not pointed out that the text of all the first four editions is identical, the sheets of all having been printed off at the same time from the same type, and issued in four parcels ("editions") of five hundred each. Nor is it mentioned that the "gilt design of roses and trellis-work" of the binding was designed by the poet. In the case of the 'Ballads and Sonnets' nothing at all is said of its binding, and the collation is incomplete.

In works such as 'Early Editions,' which are made up of a multitude of details, there must necessarily be a great many errors, and large allowance must be made, except where the error is manifestly due to carelessness. It is to be hoped that Mr. Slater may find in a second edition an opportunity of correcting not only the slips which his various critics have pointed out, but also the numerous others which a careful revision on his own account will bring to his notice. He will add one more to the many benefits he has conferred on the collector if in the second edition he will omit all reference to the thorny subject of prices current, and make use of the space so gained by adding the careful collations which alone give permanent value to a bibliography.

Church Folk-lore: a Record of some Post-Reformation Usages in the English Church, now mostly Obsolete. By the Rev. J. Edward Vaux. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

It is difficult to understand why this book is called 'Church Folk-lore'; nor do we understand its second title. It contains a great deal that is not folk-lore and a great deal that is not Church usage, while, on the other hand, it does not contain all the folk-lore that appertains to the Church, and there are many usages which ought certainly to have been discussed in it. If it were a mere question of title, it would be easy enough to effect a change when a second edition is called for, or to pass on after recording our objection. But, unfortunately, the difficulty does not end with the title. Mr. Vaux has collected a great quantity of curious notes on Church usages which obtain locally, and which he rightly assumes are relics of an earlier universal usage in the Church; and as these notes are mostly obtained from observations of the local clergy communicated to Mr. Vaux, and through him now printed for the first time, they may prove of considerable value and interest to the future historian of the Church. He does not pretend to be more than a collector—in fact, his book is almost irritatingly simple in its methods on this account; he has printed a highly curious note-book, and he tells his readers so very plainly. But then he will here and there introduce an explanation of a custom or superstition in terms of the utmost certainty: "no doubt" one custom is derived from the Romans, "of course" another is a relic of Druidism, while others are called very ancient, because parallels are mentioned in the Old Testament. We do not want to be unnecessarily severe upon a writer like Mr. Vaux, who puts before us his collections in so transparently simple a fashion; but it is to be expected in these days that an author professing to deal with any branch of folk-lore should at least know some of the results of the Folk-lore Society's labours during the past sixteen years. We can assure Mr. Vaux that the Welsh sin-eater is by no means an undisputed successor to the scapegoat of the Bible, for Mr. Hartland has supplied a far more reasonable explanation; that well-dressing with garlands is not more or less an imitation of the Tissington ceremony; that the original significance of the St. Briavels custom of cutting underwood is not entirely lost. Many customs and superstitions like these are quoted by Mr. Vaux from Henderson, Hone, the Gentleman's Magazine, and other well-known folklore publications without any purpose, so far as we can see, for they are not Church folklore. Because, for instance, the local deity of wells has been replaced by the Christian saint, it does not thereby follow that the cult of sacred wells belongs to Church folk-lore. In Ireland it happens that the Roman Catholic Church did actually take over some of the ceremonial usages at sacred wells as a part of its own ritual, and it may be that this same circumstance has brought about the survival in England; but to deal with this subject is not Mr. Vaux's professed object, nor is he equipped for the task. In point of fact, a book on Church folk-lore is very much needed. It would disintegrate those parts of ancient ceremonial which have been accepted by the Church and so preserved, and those parts which have been rejected by the Church and retained by the people, and it would seek to draw conclusions from the line which marks the respective areas of acceptance and rejection. But Mr. Vaux does not do this. For instance, he takes it that all customs connected with birth, marriage, or death are Church folk-lore, because the Church has to deal with all these stages of life; and the significance of the division between Church and popular usage is thus entirely lost sight of. If he had kept to his subject more closely, he would have had room for such important branches of it as the robes of the priests, the sanctity of the priesthood against the powers of witchcraft and faircraft, the growth of superstition around the church structure, church furniture, and ceremonies, and the remarkable customs which have remained in particular churches almost unchanged in pagan times.

But we will not leave Mr. Vaux in this complaining mood. Our quarrel with him does not involve the proposition that his book is altogether useless. It contains a great deal of information which is given at first hand and which cannot be obtained from any other book yet printed. The custom of "flapping the church" in Yorkshire is most curious, and we have never heard of it before. It would be interesting to know its origin. The fact that in Cumberland it is quite against the rule for the fathers and mothers of the couple who are to be united to attend a marriage is very significant, and further examples would be most welcome. We should like, too, to know more of the processional dolls, of which Mr. Vaux gives one or two examples. Moreover Mr. Vaux has an eye to the humorous in these things. Some of his stories are really very good. The quarrel between two ladies as to their respective rights to a pew, which was decided by the astute rector saying that the elder had the stronger claim, we think we have heard of before; but others are quite new. At Connemara some dozen dogs sat behind their masters in the chapel during mass:—

"One of these dogs amused me greatly. He sat most quietly through the earlier portion of the mass. As soon as the Creed had been recited and the celebrant turned round to deliver the sermon, the dog looked up as much as to say 'Oh! sermon time! all right,' and having, dog fashion, walked round three times, curled himself up for a comfortable sleep. The sermon, which did not last more than ten minutes, being over, the dog woke up and sat on his tail behind his shepherd master until the service was ended. There was something so deliciously human about this that I have never forgotten it."

In Devonshire the churcing of women is termed "uprose":—

"I shall never forget (says my informant) the bewilderment of a strange clergyman who had taken a baptism in a parish church in that county, when the clerk followed him into the vestry with the mysterious announcement: 'Her wants to be uprose.'"

One further story we must find room for:—

"Shortly before his death Mr. Baldwin intimated his desire to be buried at sea in order to disappoint the frequently expressed intention of his wife that if she survived him she would, out of contempt for him, dance on his grave."

We agree with Mr. Vaux that there is a delicate vein of humorous irony conveyed in the husband's dying request, which has rarely been equalled on such an occasion.

NEW NOVELS.

Mary Fenwick's Daughter. By Beatrice Whitby. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

To write a sequel to a successful novel is, of course, rather a dangerous experiment, though it is one for which there are plenty of distinguished precedents. In the present instance the risks are unusually obvious, for the successors to Miss Whitby's clever story 'The Awakening of Mary Fenwick' have been chiefly remarkable for their disappointing inferiority to her first book. She may be said, however, to have justified her courage in reviving the Fenwick family. Mary's daughter "Bab" is once more a strong and striking character study. The healthy, spoilt girl, with her slow perceptions and love of outdoor pursuits, is a familiar type of English country-house life. She exists by thousands, but has seldom been more skilfully manipulated than by Miss Whitby. The underlying large qualities, which eventually balance a total deficiency of small ones in the manly and chivalrous maiden, are developed with skill and consistency. The unconscious egotism with which this stupid girl tramples on all the finer susceptibilities of the young man who cannot help adoring her is vividly drawn. Jack Holland's determined effort to break away from her, his apparent success, and her clumsy astonishment are treated with power and restraint. Bab's subsequent adventures and the development of her soul after various afflictions have reduced her animal spirits to a lower pitch, her experience of an egotism far grosser than her own, lead up by clever gradations to a climax which is, perhaps, a little obvious. It is certainly not a wholly satisfactory one to a reader who has been vividly impressed by the two striking character sketches in this clever story.

Winifred Mount. By Richard Pryce. 2 vols. (Methuen & Co.)

Those who have followed the steps of the clever young novelist Mr. Pryce need not be told that he has written, and probably will write, better things than 'Winifred Mount.' It is a smart and vivacious enough bit of work, but that allowed, the best has, perhaps, been said of it. Mr. Pryce shows himself, as usual, quite "in the movement," in the heart of the London of pleasure, with its passing fashions and ephemeral catchwords. In general a neat and compact workman, we miss in this story a leading motive and a sufficiently distinct centre of interest. The matter is shovelled in anyhow, as though the arrangement were of no consequence. There are false starts—incidents that appear to be taking one somewhere, and are, after all, out of the thoroughfare altogether. The mystery that overshadows the heroine from the outset turns out to be utterly inadequate, and at the same time unnecessarily painful. The sleep-walking episode is absolutely useless for furthering the action of the story or explaining the characters of the actors. Had it opened up some new phase it would have had its reason, but it does not, and is consequently only material in the wrong place. It but serves to show Mr. Pryce's curious affection for the morbid, ugly, or merely uncomfortable in situations. The best of the book is the French school, where the three girl friends who figure in the story are introduced. Their talk is sometimes natural and girlish—nineteenth century girlishness, of course. Later on, though the three are carefully differentiated and contrasted, there is a want of discrimination and point, and the reader sometimes has to turn back for a page or two in order to see which girl is for the moment speaking. There are clever, sharp bits of writing, effects of London people in London and elsewhere; but the "society fooling" is just a little forced and unspontaneous at times, though, perhaps unfortunately, not always unlike the real thing.

The Prodigals. By Mrs. Oliphant. 2 vols. (Methuen & Co.)

There is a limit to the greatest power of production. It would be little short of a calamity should Mrs. Oliphant's vein become exhausted, yet her present work betrays signs of too rapid workmanship. Natural and pathetic as are the mental troubles of tender-hearted Winnie, who is rent by the divided duty of respecting the wishes of her dead father, whom she loves in spite of his tyranny, and of preserving to her brothers what she considers their rightful inheritance, we cannot but find them somewhat too long drawn out for the substance of the story. And this is of the thinnest. It is impossible to construct a novel absolutely without incident. And therefore, though Winifred is charming, if a little silly; though her two shiftless brothers—George, careworn and anxious, and Tom, cubbish and egotistical—are drawn with many a clever touch of cynical appreciation; though that innocent schemer, the stout sister-in-law from Australia, and even Mr. Hopkins, the butler, are sketches which show the master hand, the present volumes are inadequate to sustain a reputation which every lover of fiction values. Not that more may not be evolved from the future fortunes of the heroine and her manly lover, who is a gentleman of much promise.

The Ban of Maplethorpe. By E. H. Dering. 2 vols. (Art and Book Company.)

THE most interesting features of these volumes are the biographical sketch of the author, and certain views of two typical manor houses, Surrenden Dering and Baddesley Clinton. The friendly generosity of the late Mr. Dering to the ancient family of Ferrers seems creditable to all concerned; but in spite of many complications, and the tortuous machinations and signal defeat of certain villainous adventurers, branded with such unlovely names as Twerleby and Diabolouski, the romance is merely a vehicle for the conveyance of certain doctrines of scholastic philosophy, which are the less impressive in that the hearers of those doctrines never venture to argue, but meekly accept the truths set before them by their eloquent instructor. We need not complain of such characteristic judgments as that Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer were "three of the greatest scoundrels in England," still less of allusions like that to "Dr. Benson, who fancies he sits in St. Augustine's chair," but may acknowledge that however thoroughgoing a partisan was the writer, he evidently possessed considerable reading, and, apart from his polemical enthusiasm, considerable shrewdness. Some of the studies of Anglican clergymen, such as the High-Church Dean, or the Evangelical "old Blunderton, with his congregation of faithful men," are humorous enough. It is characteristic that all the virtuous people, even to a noisy Squire Blastmore, whose name is strictly onomatopoeic, become sooner or later members of the Roman Catholic Church.

Tom Sawyer Abroad. By Mark Twain. (Chatto & Windus.)

MARK TWAIN may console himself with the reflection that even greater writers than he have found that an attempt to pursue the fortunes of successful characters in a second book has proved a failure; for 'Tom Sawyer Abroad' will come as a grievous disappointment to admirers of the 'Adventures of Tom Sawyer' or of his friend Huckleberry Finn. Both boys reappear in this volume, but they have lost nearly all their fun, perhaps because they have become older in the interval. Their conversations are really quite dull, and there is not an adventure worth remembering; nothing, for example, approaching that beautiful performance for three days only at the riverside village in 'Huckleberry Finn.' The two boys with their negro friend Jim are taken off in a flying machine from their home in America, across the Atlantic and the Sahara, to Egypt. The perfection of the machine is such that hardly any adventures are possible, so they are reduced by way of incident to tantalizing lions in Africa by hanging just above their reach; and the sort of joke which comes almost as a relief is Huck Finn's inability to understand that they are passing over Indiana because it is green, and not red as shown in the map. Mark Twain has often proved that he has the gift of being amusing; it is a pity that he should squander himself on such a book as this.

A Costly Freak. By Maxwell Gray. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

'A COSTLY FREAK' suggests little in the way of adverse or other criticism. When one has said that the plot—wherein a cat and a dog play the most important parts and are responsible for a painful entanglement in human affairs—is far-fetched, improbable, and rather poorly treated, and that some of the "humans" show not much worldly wisdom, the worst is said. When it is added that the character of the Evangelical parson has sundry finely expressed traits, and that there are others with hints of human nature, the best seems to have been put forward. We are far from wishing to say that the author of 'The Silence of Dean Maitland' has written a superfluous volume, yet see no opportunity of giving it unqualified praise or blame.

Only a Drummer Boy. By Arthur Amyand. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

THERE is a frankly amateurish strain about 'Only a Drummer Boy,' yet it indicates real acquaintance with barrack life and manners. There is also a thread of something a little "put up" and melodramatic; but as it appears to be a first story, and guiltless of real affectations or outrages on style or taste, we have no wish to pick holes in it. The drummer boy comes of a good old stock, though his father, through his own imprudence and the neglect of his family, has gone down in the world. The boy, after his death, weary of the cold neglect and enforced protection of an uncle, enlists in "The Strappers." Some of his experiences are well told, though they suffer from a want of focus, and the final pages scarce fit the restrained tone of the earlier chapters. A want of balance and finish helps, too, to make of it a less effective story than it might be.

Le Droit de l'Enfant. Par Georges Ohnet. (Paris, Ollendorff.)

M. OHNET's "Battles of Life," as he styles all his novels, still sell by the hundred thousand, and his 'Le Maître de Forges' was already some time back in its "306th edition." But M. Ohnet has given up trying to conquer the literary public, and works for "the masses." He turns out long and crowded volumes containing dramatic situations, although, in spite of the success on the stage of 'La Comtesse Sarah,' no one can style him with truth a great dramatist. 'Le Droit de l'Enfant' is not inferior to 'Serge Panine,' and a confirmed novel-reader may make it cover two wet days. In his novel 'La Comtesse Sarah' we had hoped that there was better promise. We shall have to drop him from our list of novelists who count with a picked public, but his books will still sell at least the "eighty editions" of his worst, and his plays will still run,—if not at the Gymnase, like his best, at least at the Porte Saint Martin. 'Le Droit de l'Enfant' is constructed on the ordinary lines of the French popular novel—immorality with a moral—and so deftly turned that its sentimentality may make even the hardened critic weep.

Ce qu'elles peuvent. Par Jeanne Schultz. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

THE author of 'La Neuvaïne de Colette' gives us in one volume one novel and one short tale. The former is a touchingly-told history of the first love of a girl for a man much older than herself, who, indeed, only "wanted to see," as he puts it, "the woman in her woke into being—nothing else." The second story is also that of a lost love—otherwise lost. In this sad narrative it is poverty that steps in to crush the poor girl's sentiment.

PHILOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

SOME time ago the Athenæum mentioned the forthcoming publication of a concise Syriac dictionary by Miss Payne-Smith, based upon the 'Thesaurus Syriacus' by her father, the Dean of Canterbury. Specimens were sent by the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, who undertook the publication of it, to prominent Syriac scholars on the Continent, in order to have their advice as to the method of the dictionary, which will address itself to students in the universities. Meanwhile Dr. Karl Brockelmann has undertaken the same kind of work, Lexicon Syriacum (Edinburgh, Clark), of which the first fasciculus contains the letters a to h. This explains the Syriac by Latin, and where the Latin is not clear, the English equivalent is given. Miss Payne-Smith's dictionary has only English equivalents, and this is certainly preferable. Dr. Brockelmann gives references to all possible Syriac works, and also to Assyrian texts, which is not only unnecessary for students, but also confusing. Miss Payne-Smith is more sober in this respect. The transliteration of Greek words which the German scholar gives is superfluous. The phraseology peculiar to Syriac is entirely neglected by Dr. Brockelmann, and the derived forms are not in their logical order. In the latter points the English work is more logical. As to the typographic execution, the German work cannot rival the clear and elegant composition of the Clarendon Press. If we are not mistaken, the price of Miss Payne-Smith's dictionary will be lower than that of the German. In one word, these two dictionaries will scarcely be rivals. English and American students will certainly prefer the English explanations to the Latin, which are in general obscure. Syriac is taken up now on such an extensive scale by the universities of all countries that there is room for the two dictionaries, which will complete one another; but it is certain that Miss Payne-Smith was the first in the field, and the Delegates of the Clarendon Press are right to continue the work which they had begun before the German work was even planned. We may mention another kind of rivalry in the Syriac field. Dr. Bahlfs, a pupil of the late Prof. Paul de Lagarde, criticizes severely in the Göttingische Gelehrten Anzeigen the edition of the Syriac lexicon of Bar Bahlul by M. R. Duval, who has replied in the last number of the Journal Asiatique, showing that his critic scarcely knows the rudiments of the Syriac language. Such attacks put Oriental learning in no favourable light.

THE Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, ever zealously at work in the cause of vernacular education in Africa and the East, has lately brought out a Second Yao-English Primer, by R. S. Hyde, which is intended to serve the double purpose of assisting Europeans in learning Yao and natives in acquiring English. The Yao are a powerful agricultural nation south and east of the Nyasa, extending as far as the Shire Highlands, and are bordered on the west by the Manganga, in whose language (which belongs to the southern sub-division of the eastern branch of the Bantu family) the first instalment of the 'Pilgrim's Progress' has just been published by the Society. Turning about eight degrees north, to the dialects spoken in the regions between Bagamoyo on the coast and Tabora, which are all of the Swahili type, we have before us a Primer in Ki-Gogo, a vernacular spoken to the west of Usagara, and a book of Hymns in Ki-Megji, the local dialect of Mamboia, in the northern part of Usagara. A reading book and portions of the Prayer Book in the same language are in the press.

In view of the growing political importance of the languages of Africa, it appears highly desirable that the Zeitschrift für afrikanische Sprachen, founded and ably conducted by the late Dr. Büttner, but discontinued since 1890, should be resuscitated on international lines, and supported by the various governments mainly interested in the civilization of Africa. Such a revival, while tending to promote and stimulate literary research, could not but be also fruitful for practical purposes.

SHORT STORIES.

The Flower of Forgiveness. By Flora Annie Steel. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)—Barring none—save only Mr. Kipling—Mrs. Steel is our best exponent, among novelists, of the complex phases of Anglo-Indian life. Few without being tedious could enter so completely into the core of native thought and feeling, or set a reader's understanding and sympathies so quickly at work. Mrs. Steel is never tedious, and these volumes of short stories are, as might be expected, distinctly good reading. We are not inclined to quarrel with so attractive a title as 'The Flower of Forgiveness.' Though the story that gives its name to the volumes is the first, it is by no means the most important. Each tale is a more or less artistic illustration of some point or other in the traditions, customs, and outlook of a people acted on by alien influences. Time-worn superstitions, mysteries of caste, the wretchedness of widowhood, the contempt for female offspring, the conditions of land tenure, the progress and effect for good or ill of European ideas and rule, are brought out, as it were incidentally, in the course of a story. The author has evidently lost no opportunity of studying the racial differences and idiosyncrasies so often unnoted in the teeming millions who, like streams of human life, flow side by side for centuries without mingling. The sense of extreme antiquity and mystery, that seems the secret of Indian peculiarities, and the effect of our own civilization have permeated her fancy and informed all her material. The complicated undercurrents responsible for many obscure tragedies in Eastern lives are felt by her intuitively and intensely. Cases unknown or ignored by the majesty of the law, unmeasured by foot-rule and not entered on any revenue map, are present to her. Some of the stories—and they are not the least admirable—deal with peasant life, agrarian difficulties, and the tortuous ways of the usurer. The patience on the one side and the oppression on the other are quietly and, one may suppose, fairly presented. There is no overstrained sentiment or cheap pathos in Mrs. Steel's works. 'In the House of the Copper-smith,' 'Feroza,' 'The Bhut Baby,' 'Ramchunderji,' 'Heera Nund,' and 'For the Faith,' have each and all mixed elements of humour and pathos. But the best of all is, perhaps, 'The Footstep of Death.' The truly philosophic attitude of the blind beggar, his patience, sweet courtesy, yet undying revenge, show some of the author's best qualities—tenderness, sympathy, grace of expression, and a humorous observation as pleasant as it is rare. Here is the description of a smile, not included in Blake's list of the species: "A curious philanthropic smile which while it welcomes the object has a kind of circumambient beam of mutual congratulation for all spectators of the benevolence." Most people have seen such a smile, though they may not have been able to define it.

The Upper Berth. By F. Marion Crawford. "Autonym Library." (Fisher Unwin.)—Mr. Fisher Unwin starts his companion series to the "Pseudonym Library" by a couple of short stories by Mr. Marion Crawford. The volumes promise to be as handy in shape and size as those of the original series: the printing is excellent, the paper is good, and the external appearance is neat and attractive; but to judge from this specimen the letterpress will hardly prove as attractive as it has been in a majority of the "Pseudonym Library" publications. The publisher evidently wished to start the series with a well-known name, trusting to the attractions of the name rather than of the stories, which are very trivial. The title story, it is true, has some of the elements of a good ghost in it: the green slimy thing is distinctly gruesome, and its accompaniments inspire some horror, but nothing much comes of it, while its want of plausibility detracts from the interest. It is a good idea insufficiently worked out. But the second story has not even a good idea in it; its details are dull, and the central incident awakens no astonishment. The little pamphlet enclosed with the book, containing various puffs preliminary of the series, was not a happy inspiration on Mr. Unwin's part.

In Varying Moods. By Beatrice Harraden. (Blackwood & Sons.)—The first and longest story in this volume is the most charming. It tells about a scholar who is detained by an accident in a quiet Shropshire inn, and who wins the hearts of all the villagers by his gentle ways; above all, he unconsciously gains the love of a discontented village maiden who is half engaged to the exciseman, and he has to show great delicacy and tact in proving to her that her love is wasted. Altogether it makes a most touching story: the scholar, for all his unworldliness and simplicity, never becomes effeminate, and the maiden's vague unrest and dissatisfaction with her commonplace surroundings make an admirable contrast to the delight which the same circumstances afford him. Miss Harraden also gives the idea that she knows and loves the country well. The conversations of the natives, especially of the energetic hostess of the Green Dragon, are attractive by their quaint and genial humour and their evident truth. In a word, it is hardly too great praise to say of this story that its pleasant country people and their kindly observer suggest some of Mr. Hardy's most charming work. The other tales, with one exception, are not nearly so good as this one; the exception is 'A Bird on its Journey,' which, though slight, is a fresh and cheerful little story. Without any attempt at detailed description the author somehow manages to give in it just the joyous feeling of exhilaration which a Swiss mountain village can give, and the innocent trick of the merry little lady who tunes pianos is just sufficient motive for a tale of such slender proportions. After these two the lugubrious nature of the other contents of the volume is almost unpleasant: 'The Umbrella-mender' is quite a horrible study of madness, and there does not seem enough interest about the characters to make it reasonable; the 'Allegory' is dull; and of the remaining stories the best criticism is that Miss Harraden can be more interesting when she chooses.

The Monk of Mar-Saba. By Joseph Hocking. (Ward, Lock & Co.)—Of the two stories contained in this volume, 'The Monk of Mar-Saba' and 'Elrad the Hie,' the title-story is the better; but neither is so good as some of Mr. Hocking's former work. For one thing, instead of dealing with people whom he knows well, his subjects are taken from the less familiar ground of wild Bedouin tribes in Palestine; moreover in both, but especially in the second story, there is a well-intentioned, but rather oppressive flavour of guide-book information, which the comparative facilities for personal observation offered by travelling agents in these days render almost superfluous. The heroine of both stories (she is differently named in the two cases, but is evidently the same person) is a rather old-fashioned type of the fearless British blonde, whose chief characteristic is a deficient sense of humour. For example, in the first story the Bedouin chief, addressing the interpreter, says, "Tell her that I am Abou Gamska, chief of the greatest Bedouin tribe, and that I have cast my eyes upon her in favour," to which hardly anything could sound more ludicrously ineffective than her answer, "Tell him that I am Esther Morton, an English girl, and that our love is not won in this way. Tell him that if he will take me back to my father," &c. Her very name sounds ridiculous. Still there is a very stirring incident of a ride for life in this story; it is admirably described and exciting to the end; and in the second story the account of the crucial minutes, when the heroine's fate hung in the balance, is given with a vigour that almost excuses an otherwise dull story.

Eighteen of Them—Singular Stories. By Warwick Simpson. (Leadenhall Press.)—Mr. Simpson tells some amusing stories shortly and pithily. He has a happy knack of introducing with success such incongruous effects as the statue of Nelson conversing with his stone lions or a waxwork figure endowed with vitality for a night, and he has a very pretty taste in yarns about burglars. The best stories are those of the murder of the revolving lady at Truefit's, the burglary at the American duchess's, and the abstraction of Jucundus from South Kensington; but in all of them the conversations are bright and the characters cleverly sketched and lively. Mr. Simpson says he has more stories in reserve: let him publish them.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. LECKY writes a memoir prefixed to two volumes of The Speeches and Addresses of the late Lord Derby, published by Messrs. Longman & Co. The gentleman who long acted as private secretary to Secretaries of State at the Foreign Office, Sir T. Sanderson, appears to have selected many of the speeches, which are published for Lady Derby. All men recognise the weight and the judicial value of several of Lord Derby's speeches, which, indeed, had vastly more effect and influence in the early years (which are not largely represented among the speeches given here) than in the later years of his life, when he became singularly unpopular. His unequalled power was that of listening to a discussion and summing it up in well-chosen words; but he was not an entertaining speaker, and after the lapse of time which has occurred, even his earlier speeches have ceased to be interesting. Mr. Lecky's memoir is admirable, but he is obliged by truth to praise the father of Lord Derby by contrast with the son. We should have wished to hear more of the curious episode of the offer of the throne of Greece to Lord Stanley in 1862, of which Disraeli said, "They will prefer Knowles to the Parthenon, and Lancashire to the Attic plains." Nothing can be in better taste than Mr. Lecky's memoir, in which he brings out the hatred of rhetoric, the thorough mastery of all questions, the simplicity and absence of ostentation, and the detestation of cant, which, with his solidity of judgment, were the best characteristics of Lord Derby. We venture, however, to prophesy that in the next century his father—"the Prime Minister Lord" of Lancashire—will be remembered by his translation of Homer, if not by his brilliant speeches, and that the son will be remembered only as the man who planted two million trees.

MR. W. LEE-WARNER, of the Indian Civil Service, who has had great experience for many years in the Foreign Department of the Government of India, and more recently as a political agent at native courts in Southern India, publishes through Messrs. Macmillan & Co. The Protected Princes of India. We reviewed not long ago a most interesting work by Mr. Tupper on the same subject, and the volume now before us, though less suitable to the general public, is more philosophical, and of at least equal value to the student. The Indian Government has every reason to be proud of the school of authors which it is calling forth. While Mr. Tupper has discussed those aspects of the problem presented by the native states of India which appeal to every one, Mr. Lee-Warner has discussed with extreme care, and pronounces in the most authoritative manner upon, what may be called the international law of the native states under our protection. As becomes a member of a family of great scholars, he begins with a dissertation on the failure of ancient Rome to preserve her native states, and, passing on to the position of British India, he discusses its history before 1813, from 1813 to 1857, with special reference to the policy of Lord Hastings (of whom he says: "The stamp of his originality and individuality is visible everywhere"), throws the responsibility of the annexation of Oudh upon the home authorities, and clears Lord Dalhousie. He then discusses the modern policy which has followed 1857, the rendition of Mysore, and what he styles the risks of "benevolent coercion." Turning next to practical politics, he gives us his views upon the failure of the experiment of military contingents, with the exception of Hyderabad, which he treats as an exception to the rule. The experiment of imperial service troops he dismisses very properly with polite contempt. It is the new policy of the Government which he serves, and we agree with both the words and the underlying suggestion contained in the following passage: "That the experiment is interesting and creditable to all parties no one can doubt; and that it may succeed is much to be hoped." Mr. Lee-Warner then passes on to the international position of the native states as towards one another and as towards outsiders. These subjects lead him to consider the right of British intervention for the suppression of rebellion, to check misrule, to suppress inhuman practices, to secure religious toleration, for the trial of Europeans and Americans who owe allegiance to foreign nations, and in other matters. For the general public Mr. Lee-Warner's book would have been of greater interest had he discussed the special position of the frontier states, such as Kheilat, Afghanistan, and the dependencies of Kashmir; but we are well aware that there are doubts and difficulties which make it a highly delicate matter for an officer of the Indian Government to write upon these matters, and the same remark applies to the question next in interest connected with native states which lie within our Indian orbit, namely, the possibility, on the one hand, of putting down their armies, and, on the other hand, of extending to some countries, at present directly administered by ourselves, the many advantages of native rule.

We are glad to see a reprint by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. of Dr. Guilié's tract An Essay on the Instruction and Amusement of the Blind, the French original of which was printed in Paris at the beginning of the century; and it is particularly gratifying to note the public spirit and generosity of the anonymous donor at whose cost the work has been reissued. But we question whether it would not have been better to have placed the volume in the hands of a competent editor with instructions to add foot-notes, and so bring the information up to the standard of our present knowledge. There is undoubtedly much that is interesting in the present pages. Two chapters deal with numerous instances not generally known of blind persons who have made themselves famous in the sciences and arts, and contain many curious and instructive facts. On the other hand, certain of the views of the author are contrary to the more enlightened notions of the present day—in particular the erroneous theory propounded at p. 37 that the decided taste that the blind possess for independence and liberty is contrary to their real interests. Modern experience is quite opposed to this view, and in favour of encouraging the independence and fearlessness of the blind by every possible means, as a proper preparation for the after struggle of life. There are also some remarks scattered throughout the book which indicate that the author is too prone to assume that a blind person necessarily means one who is blind from birth—an amazing blunder in an expert, the average commencing age of blindness in England being thirty-one years. On the numerous chapters dealing with the appliances for the teaching and manual occupations of those bereft of sight we have no space to dwell further than to remind readers that they are nearly all out of date. The Braille alphabet in particular is not mentioned, and it is the most important at the present day. Those remarks of ours are necessary, as the book may find its way into institutions, where an unreserved acceptance of its views would do harm. But for those who are older and able to judge for themselves there is much suggestive matter scattered throughout its 160 pages.

The Year-Book of the Scientific and Learned Societies of Great Britain (Griffin & Co.) has reached its eleventh year, and, although rather poorly edited at starting, has so improved as to become a serviceable work of reference. It still, however, could be made more perfect. If we are not mistaken, the Camden Society has issued some volumes in the past year, but not one is mentioned. Again, the editor is still too fond of imagining that by writing "No return" he is excused from seeking further for information. Why, again, is that highly respectable body the London and Middlesex Archaeological Society dismissed with two lines of small type at the bottom of a page?—We have further received two useful volumes: London in 1894 (Allen & Co.), originally started by the late Mr. Fry; and The Sportsman's Guide to the Rivers, Lochs, Moors, and Deer Forests of Scotland, by Mr. Watson-Lyall.

We have before now called attention to the delightful edition of Dumas's romances which Messrs. Dent are issuing, and now need only say that The Page of the Duke of Savoy is produced in a fashion worthy of its predecessors. The illustrations are excellent, the frontispiece to the first volume being particularly good.—Kit and Kitty, by Mr. Blackmore, has appeared in Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.'s neat and cheap reprint of that distinguished writer's novels.—Messrs. Macmillan have reissued Mr. Archibald Forbes's Souvenirs of some Continents.

We have on our table Paterson's Practical Statutes, edited by J. S. Cotton, Part I. (Cox).—Guide to Somerset House, the Law Courts, and Government Offices, by T. W. Hanrahan (Evans).—Examination Questions in Book-Keeping, by E. Harlow (Wilson).—Gray's 'Elegy' and Goldsmith's 'Traveller' and 'Deserted Village,' with Explanatory Notes by F. BYRON AND SHELLEY AT RAVENNA.

A PAIR of interesting letters of Byron, unprinted by Moore, will be sold at Sotheby's on Monday. Both were written at Ravenna in the summer of 1821, to a certain Signor Alberghetti, whose name is unknown to Moore's index, but who appears to have acted as Byron's go-between in his standing quarrel with the Cardinal-Archbishop's Government. The earlier letter is dated June 28th, and relates to one of the numerous collisions between Byron's servants and the Ravennese officials. He probably came off victorious in this case, but equally probably it hastened the exile of the two Counts Gamba, which followed in about a fortnight. A more serious affair of the same description, recorded in Moore's 'Life' (one-vol. ed., 517), may have contributed to the enforced flight of the Countess Guiccioli a month later.

"It appears to me that there must be some clerical intrigue of the low priests about the Cardinal to render all this nonsense necessary about a squabble in the streets of words only—between a soldier and a servant. If it is directed against me—it shan't succeed—for I desire no better than a fair examination of my conduct—as far as connected with the place or the inhabitants. If against the poor valet, it is a vicious oppression. I desire no more than a process, for then they would see the falsehood of all the trash about this man who has no more to do with political matters than the Man in the Moon.....If they think to get rid of me—they shan't—for I am conscious of no fault—I will yield to no oppression; but will go at my own good time when it suits my inclinations and affairs."

The other letter was written on August 15th, so that there can be no doubt that Shelley was the "English gentleman" who was refused admittance to the cathedral. Here is an extract from Byron's blistering letter:—

"An English gentleman and friend of mine has this day been refused admittance into the Duomo by the Comparsa in the most insolent manner. As I have not the honour of personal acquaintance with the Archbishop I should thank you to represent this to him—whatever his feelings may be towards me—I presume that he does not encourage his people's insults to strangers.....the readiness of your authorities to incaluate my servants on all occasions, will not permit me to pass over this. If the Archbishop chastises his insolent dependent, it is well—if not, I will find means to punish him at any cost.....If he [the Archbishop] or others suppose that political circumstances have at all diminished my power to make myself properly respected they will discover the difference," &c.

MR. EDMUND YATES.

MR. EDMUND YATES has been commonly called "the father of Society journalism." Yet the phrase is extravagant. There has been very little break in the continuity of literature fairly answering to this description from the Monthly Mirror of a century ago to the Out, with which Mr. Grenville Murray had been connected before he assisted Mr. Yates in the creation of the World. Moreover, Mr. Yates, who was a man of many frank admissions, never owned to the paternity of a "Society" paper. He repudiated that description for the World as energetically as one has heard the founder of a famous monthly periodical repudiate for it the name of "magazine," insisting on that of review. But the definition of a "Society" paper is admittedly difficult. The daily papers, which always did record the walks of the Queen upon the slopes at Windsor, have adopted, since the World began in 1874, the interview and other modern methods of personal journalism. They are all "Society" journals in some sense of the word, and more "journals," at any rate, than was the weekly World, which was particularly proud of describing itself as "a journal for men and women." "Society" journalism, as we understand the word, may perhaps be better called "personal" journalism; but the personality in it is the editor's. The World, as founded by Mr. Yates, was a personal paper, because it was a one-man paper—confessing the same by the frequent use of the first person in its columns. It is true that Mr. Yates chose colleagues of special strength; but it is a witness to his pre-eminence on the paper that it was always associated in men's minds with his name, not with theirs. He took the burden of "Atlas" on his own broad shoulders, even if he had to stagger into Holloway Prison under the weight of it. For strength or weakness, the paper remained a personal, or one-person, paper. The public—no less than the law in the case of the blundering countess's paragraph—took what the World said to be what Mr. Yates said, and Mr. Labouchere drove the intimacy home when he referred to it as what "Edmund" said.

Mr. Yates brought to this main achievement of his career, the foundation of the World, a varied experience in literature and life. He was born in the year 1831 in Edinburgh, where his parents were on a stage tour. His father, who was both an actor and a manager, died when his son was only eleven; but his mother, who was ranked among the leading melodramatic actresses of her day, lived until 1860. Mr. Edmund Yates, whose schooling was done at Highgate and at Düsseldorf, was by the time of his mother's death a seasoned clerk in the Post Office, well on the way to the headship of the Lost Letter Department. By that time, too, he had entered journalism and published his first novels. In dramatic criticism he began on the Court Journal and ended on the Daily News. In 1854 he published his first book, 'My Haunts and their Frequenter,' and later he began with 'Broken to Harness' the series of novels which comprised 'Running the Gauntlet,' 'Black Sheep,' 'Forlorn Hope,' 'A Rock Ahead,' 'A Righted Wrong,' 'Castaway,' 'Dr. Wainwright's Patient,' 'The Yellow Flag,' and 'Nobody's Fortune,' and ended with 'A Silent Witness' in 1875. Those who did not think Mr. Yates a sensitive man may be surprised to hear that he often recalled in later life the mortification given him by an unfavourable review of one of these novels—in what columns need not be said. He used to say he packed his portmanteau all ready to escape from the eye of man. For his 'Double Dummy' and other pieces Mr. Yates is still remembered by old playgoers. He also faced audiences as a lecturer, especially during a tour in the States which followed his retirement from the Post Office in 1872. Some ten years ago he told the story of his own 'Recollections and Experiences' in two pleasant-spoken volumes; and this was his last contribution to the shelves of circulating libraries.

Mr. Yates was intimately associated with many of his literary contemporaries of a generation ago: with Frank Smalley (together they produced 'Mirth and Metro,' "by Two Merry Men"); with Albert Smith, whose memoir he wrote; with Anthony Trollope, his colleague in the Post Office; and, above all, with Charles Dickens, his helper and friend. As a contributor to Household Words and to All the Year Round he won the high opinion of Dickens, who boldly aided with him in the Garrick squabble which led to Yates's withdrawal from a club particularly congenial to him—almost a home, it might seem, with his mother's portrait prominent on its walls. In reading now the article by Yates which caused all the commotion, one cannot but contrast the sensitiveness of Thackeray with the callousness which every great author of to-day needs to cultivate; and, on the other hand, one may quote Yates's own recent condemnation of its "silliness and bad taste." After Dickens's death, Yates's devotion to his memory was displayed with a constancy delightful to record. Woe to the rash men or women who said or wrote anything in disparagement of the master! The trusty disciple went for them without a word of parley. "You know I am a little mad on the Dickens question," he wrote privately a year ago in a letter to some one whose criticism of Dickens he had publicly criticized with compound interest, "and probably my irritability increases as I grow older."

And now, after Yates's death, there will be many to remember his own kindnesses and civilities—the only things, indeed, one cares to remember. The present writer can speak of the relation between contributor and editor which lasted for sixteen years without a ruffle—no light tribute to an editor who had to bear every contributor's indiscretions, even to Holloway. To ladies he was particularly gracious in the little courtesies which mean great labour to a busy editor, and certainly bring great pleasure to an anxious writer. It is enough acknowledgment of an offered article to see it in print in due course, but Mr. Yates did not leave a lady in suspense for more than a few hours after the MS. went in: "Dear Mrs. —, A very nice article. Sincerely yours, Edmund Yates." Or again: "Exactly what I want, my dear Mrs. —." He could find time always, too, for his own kind of jest. An allusion to Gounod's 'O Salutaris' in a World paragraph sent to him a few months ago brought a note at once to the contributor: "By the way, should it not be Eau Salutaris?" His temperament for enjoyment of all sorts, which hard work and small rewards had not affected, was left unchanged by the great alteration of his fortune as proprietor of the World. A little house in the Baywater Road had represented the first stage, but the second answered to big houses in Portland Place or at Brighton. The ex-member of the Garrick was elected to the Carlton; and, towards the end of his life, the ex-prisoner was appointed a county magistrate.

At the recent private view of the Royal Academy he looked, despite his great loss of weight, as if he had taken a new lease of life. He had just returned from the Continent, and mentioned that he had reached Rome during the Doctors' Congress. Some one congratulated him on having been in the midst of so much medical skill; but he laughed, and said it was not he who benefited, but the populations of Europe, whose death rate had decreased during the absence of the delegates from their homes. But none would have been more grateful than he for the medical service which tended him at the Garrick Theatre last Saturday night, where he had gone to see Mrs. Bancroft in 'Money.' There, in the midst of old friends and old associations, the faintness of death overcame him, and he passed away, without any pain, at the Savoy Hotel early on Sunday morning.

THE DYMOKES OF SCRIVELSBY.

IN reference to the interesting account of 'The English Ancestry of Washington' which has recently appeared in the Athenæum, I should like to say that a very complete pedigree of the Dymoke family, which has received the imprimatur of the Herald's College, will be found in the forthcoming second edition of 'Scrivelsby,' and will sustain the accuracy of Dr. Ragar's criticisms on certain statements advanced by General Read.

There are, besides, two other interesting points in connexion with the same subject, to which attention may well be called. In the first place, General Read is hardly correct, at the present moment, in saying, except as a general statement, that "the family [of Dymoke] still retains its singular office of Champion" to the reigning sovereign. The Championship, which, it must be remembered, is strictly attached to the ownership of the manor of Scrivelsby, happens just now to be "in commission," in consequence of the testamentary disposition of the late Champion, who has devised the whole of his estates to trustees, to hold and administer for his only son, who was born in 1862, and is the present representative of the Telford branch of the family. Scrivelsby Court, too, for the first time, probably, since it became the caput baronie and dwelling-place of the Champions, is temporarily severed from the general estate, having been specially bequeathed, for her lifetime, to the widow of the late Champion.

Again, it is a curious coincidence that General Read should have been engaged at the same time with myself in trying to establish a connexion between certain English and American families, and that in the course of his investigations he should have come across the Dymokes of Scrivelsby. Although, however, we have been travelling on the same line, the author of 'The English Ancestry of Washington' has a great advantage over me. He moves in the broad light of day and knows where he is going, whereas my journey is being made more or less in the dark, and I am more hopeful than certain of reaching my destination. In one particular, at least, we stand on common ground, in that, as far as the Dymokes are concerned, we each take our starting-point from a common ancestor. Thus General Read shows indisputably that, through the marriage of Thomas Windebanke in 1566 with the eldest daughter of Sir Edward Dymoke (1), the family at Scrivelsby can claim a remote connexion with General Washington, whereas, in a much more halting fashion, I am striving to prove that the Thomas Dymoke who died at Barnstable, Mass., in 1658, was descended from the youngest son of the same Sir Edward. All this, however, will be more clearly seen in the new edition of 'Scrivelsby,' which is now nearly ready for publication.

SAMUEL LODGE.

'ENGLISH BARDS AND SCOTCH REVIEWERS.'

30, Albemarle Street, May 21, 1894.

I HAVE in my possession the MS. (of which a few lines are missing) of this poem; a genuine and a spurious first edition; a genuine and a spurious fourth edition (1811); and the copy of the fifth edition alluded to by J. D. C. This last-named volume has MS. title-page, but is in other respects perfect.

My genuine first edition was Mrs. Byron's copy, and bears her name, "C. G. Byron," in her own writing on the title-page. It is printed on thick paper, with water-mark "E. & P., 1805," and contains 696 lines.

The spurious first edition is printed on paper with water-mark "S. & C. Wise, 1812." On comparing these two volumes many points of difference present themselves.

Along with the original MS. I have Byron's MS. of the first 98 lines, which were prefixed—according to a pencil note in my grandfather's handwriting—to the third edition.

My copy of the genuine fourth edition (1,052 lines) was Byron's own, and contains his MS. comments and corrections in the margin. It is dated 1811, and the water-mark of the paper is "J. Whatman, 1805."

The spurious fourth edition is also dated 1811, but the water-mark is "J. X., 1814." As in the case of the first edition, a careful comparison with the genuine volume reveals many differences of typography.

The fifth edition (1,070 lines) has no printed title-page. I do not know if it is certain that there ever was one, as the volume never was published; neither does it bear any printer's imprint. The water-mark on the paper is "Stroud & Co., 1812."

The six lines (97-102),

But bold, exclaims a friend,.....

..... than alone with Ppe.

and the twelve lines (528-539),

Then proper Jeffrey.....

..... and inspires thy pen, make up the difference between the number of lines in this and in the fourth edition.

Besides these additions the fifth edition contains many corrections in accordance with Byron's memoranda on the fourth (e.g., for identification I may mention that in the footnote on line 56, on George Lamb, ingenious is changed to ingenuous).

I shall be happy to show these volumes to any one who is interested in the subject.

Bedford, May 19, 1894.

MR. T. COLLINS, of Harvey's Buildings, Strand, appears to have used a very miscellaneous stock of paper for the spurious third edition of 'English Bards,' for a notably mongrel copy I have to-day examined here shows the following variety of water-marks:—On title and preface, "Smith & Allcock 1816"; Sig. B, "M & B 1817"; C, "W. Turner" (no date); D, E, "M & B 1817"; F, G, and advertise-ments, "J. Green 1816."

J. D. C. does not know of any reason for doubting the genuineness of either version of the "fourth edition." In a copy of the 1811 fourth edition, however, also at Bedford, I find the water-mark is "W. Pickering & Co 1816." This copy, which has 1,052 lines, like J. D. C.'s, and the names of Sharpe and Hailes as well as Cawthorn as publishers, differs in another detail from the 1810 fourth. It has the following footnote to the first page of the preface:—

"* This Preface was written for the Second Edition, and printed with it. The Noble Author had left this country previous to the publication of that Edition, and is not yet returned."

A copy of the first edition which I have seen has the water-mark dated 1804.

S. LANE-POOLE.

The Homestead, Latham, Ormskirk.

I PRESUME Moore is J. D. C.'s authority for the statement that Francis Hodgson wrote the passage in the first edition which is the only one omitted in the second. A comparison of this with the substituted passage in the second edition will, I think, convince so able a judge as J. D. C. that it is more Byronic than its successor.

The eliminated passage consists of sixteen lines on pp. 21-2 of the first edition, beginning:

Or take the only path that open lies, and the substituted passage with the same footnote consists of twenty-two lines on pp. 28-9 30 of the second edition, beginning:—

But if some new-born whim, or larger tribe.

As the first edition is very different from the second, of which all subsequent editions are with little alteration reprints, a collation of my copies of these editions may be of some interest.

First edition, 12mo. demy, pp. vi-54, without date [1809] and author's name. Publisher, "James Cawthorn, British Library, | No. 24, Cockspur Street." "T. Collina, printer, No. 1, Harvey's Buildings, Strand." Water-mark, "E. & P. 1805."

Second edition, cr. 8vo. pp. vii-85, including a new postscript with one unpagged leaf of Cawthorn's announcements at the end. Under the title, "By | Lord Byron." "Second edition, | with | considerable additions and alterations." Publisher, Cawthorn, as before, but dated "1809." At the back of the title-page and p. 85, "Printed by Deans & Co. Hart-Street, Covent Garden." Water-mark, "Budgen & Wilmott | 1808."

The versification of the first edition is much broken up, and difficult to follow in the second. The first edition has 696 lines, and the second 1,050 lines, so that, taking into account the sixteen lines omitted in the latter, the second edition contains 370 new lines, which are distributed as follows:—

	Lines.
All on pp. 1 to 7	94
First on p. 8	2
Last on p. 9	4
All on p. 10	10
Last on p. 28	2
All on pp. 29 to 33	50
First on p. 33	3
Last on p. 49	2
All on pp. 50 to 54	45
First on p. 55	2
Last on p. 59	10
All on p. 60	16
First on p. 61	8
Last on p. 66	12
First on p. 67	10
Last on p. 73	6
First on p. 74	6
Last on p. 75	8
Last on p. 78	8
All on p. 79 to end	52

Total 370

The first twenty-nine lines of the preface are new. "Keeps" in the first edition, l. 438, p. 36, becomes "Stares" in the second, l. 597, p. 47. The lines

Now 'e'en a hackney'd Muse will deign to smile
On minor Byron, or mature Carlisle, in the first edition, ll. 489-90, p. 39, become

No Muse will cheer with renovating smile,
The paralytic pulling of Carlisle:

in the second edition, ll. 707-8, p. 56, and the note on Byron's censure of the Earl of Carlisle, second edition, pp. 71, 72, does not appear in the first. "Unknown" in the first edition, l. 678, p. 53, becomes "unasked" in the second, l. 971, p. 77; and the postscript and advertisements at end of second edition do not appear in the first.

JAMES BROMLEY

24, Hampton Place, Brighton, May 21, 1894.

I HAVE been interested in the letters in the Athenæum respecting 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.' I have a third edition of this work in boards, and printed label pasted on the outside "English Bards, &c.," preface and title-page as described by Roma-spina, and two pages of Cawthorn's advertisements, all dated 1810; but on examining the water-mark I find "J. & R. Ansell 1818" on several pages of the poem. Not having seen this name mentioned in any of the letters induces me to write you, as it would appear many different papers were used.

JOHN HAINES.

KARL FRIEDRICH FRÖBEL.

ON the 6th inst. there died in Edinburgh a teacher who, being of a retiring disposition and of great amiability, had lived there almost unknown. A nephew of the famous inventor of the Kindergarten, he laboured in the cause of elementary education. He was born at Griesheim in 1807. After studying the natural sciences at Jena and teaching at Zurich for a lengthened period, he came to Scotland in 1852, and was teacher of modern languages at Inverness for a few years. He then proceeded to Edinburgh, where his wife, who had been a pupil of the great Fröbel, opened a school. The Kindergarten system was not at that time well known in Great Britain, and Mr. Fröbel's attempts to found a Kindergarten in Edinburgh were unavailing. He delivered, however, lectures in Liverpool on the subject, which were published in a small pamphlet. He then devoted his attention to the development of form drawing, and published drawing-books first in Edinburgh and later in Leipzig; these books were very advantageous for the invention of decorative and ornamental designs. Mr. Fröbel was also a philosopher, and published in 1881 'Definite Axioms on a Future Science of Existence.' His brother Julius, one of the Frankfurt Deputies of 1848, died last Christmas. Mr. Fröbel leaves behind him daughters, who keep a school.

A JOURNAL ROOM FOR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

18, Lansdowne Terrace, N.W.

DR. GLADSTONE has fallen into the usual error of most Englishmen in thinking that "science" is necessarily confined to the organized study of the physical universe. In advocating a Journal Room at the British Museum, where "scientific" journals might be made accessible to specialist readers, I was not thinking only, or even chiefly, of the physical and biological sciences. The South Kensington Museum does something for these branches of knowledge, though by no means on an adequate scale.

But for the historical and philological sciences—not to speak of theology—there exists no such convenience, and I was thinking more of publications like Anglia, the Göttingen Nachrichten, Orientalische Bibliographie, Journal des Savants, Hermes, Zeitschrift für Volkskunde, Jahrbücher der romanischen Philologie—to quote a few at random. If one does not buy them, these and many like them can only be seen at the British Museum, and then generally eighteen months or two years after publication. I am suggesting that they should be filed on arrival and made accessible in a separate room.

Literary Gossip.

THE works of Mr. R. L. Stevenson have hitherto, as is well known, been issued by various publishers in very various forms, and are not to be had in any uniform or complete edition. Mr. Stevenson's representatives in this country now propose to supply this deficiency by issuing his entire works in a new and uniform edition, limited in number and of the choicest possible style and appearance. This is to be called the "Edinburgh" edition, and is to be printed by Messrs. Constable on paper especially manufactured for the purpose and from a new fount of type, with the view of making it an example of the very best that can be done in the way of book production in Scotland at the present date. The edition will be absolutely limited to a thousand copies, and will include several "juvenilia" and other papers, both tales and travels, which have not hitherto been reprinted from the periodicals in which they appeared, and are not likely to be reprinted in any other form. The edition will consist of twenty volumes, divided in groups according to their subject-matter, namely, essays and miscellanies, travels and excursions, tales and fantasies, romances, history and biography, poems and ballads; and it is hoped that the first volume may be issued in October next, and be followed by others at intervals of about a month. The title-page will bear the names of all the publishers interested, viz., Messrs. Longman & Co., Cassell & Co., Seeley & Co., and Chatto & Windus; the last-named firm undertaking the distribution of the edition to subscribers.

THE late Prof. Robertson Smith planned to bring out a Dictionary of the Bible, to be published by Messrs. Black. We believe that Canon Cheyne has undertaken the editorship of this important work.

MR. B. P. GRENFELL, who was recently elected to the Craven Travelling Fellowship at Oxford, has obtained in Egypt a number of Greek papyri and fragments of vellum codices. Among the latter are parts of the tenth and eleventh chapters of Zechariah in the Septuagint, and a small piece of the eighth chapter of St. Mark's Gospel, in the very early style of uncial writing, so that they are probably not later than the fifth century. But a much more important discovery is a fragment of papyrus containing Ezekiel v. 12 to vi. 3 in the text of the Septuagint as corrected by Origen. This is shown by the fact that the papyrus differs substantially from the Codex Vaticanus and Codex Alexandrinus, but is generally in agreement with the Codex Marchalianus, and, like that MS., contains Hexaplaric critical signs, though somewhat differently used. The papyrus is ascribed by Dr. Karl Wessely to the end of the third or the beginning of the fourth century, and therefore it may have been written within fifty years of Origen's death, and is probably not less than three hundred years older than the Codex Marchalianus, which is ascribed to the seventh century.

HOMER is represented in Mr. Grenfell's papyri by four fragments: two belonging to the eighth book of the Iliad, one to the twelfth of the Iliad, and one to the fifth book of the Odyssey. They date from the first three or four centuries A.D., and, as is generally the case with Homer papyri of this period, support the vulgate text. The rest of Mr. Grenfell's papyri consist chiefly of letters and law documents, which, with the exception of a letter belonging to the end of the second century B.C., are of the second, third, or fourth century of our era.

A MEETING of the subscribers towards the Seaside Home for Booksellers and their Assistants was held on Thursday at 56, Old Bailey, to appoint a committee of management.

WE have to announce with regret the death of Mr. Brian Houghton Hodgson, formerly Minister at the Court of Nepal, and well known as a discoverer both in Buddhist literature and in physical science. Mr. Hodgson died on Wednesday last at Holloway's Hotel, Dover Street, from the effects of a chill, at the advanced age of ninety-five. A more extended notice of his career will appear in a future issue.

MR. RICHARD WELFORD, of Gosforth, Northumberland, is about to publish by private subscription, through Walter Scott, Limited, a work in three volumes, entitled 'Men of Mark 'twixt Tyne and Tweed,' containing over 450 biographies of persons who, in various ways and degrees, have figured in the public life of the town of Newcastle and the county of Northumberland during the last five hundred years. The volumes will contain a considerable number of illustrative views and portraits. Most of the biographies have appeared during the last five years in the Newcastle Weekly Chronicle.

THE Rev. C. F. S. Warren is writing a monograph on the English translations of the 'Dies Irae' from that of Joshua Sylvester downwards. The work will be amply supplied with chronological tables, and will if possible be published in the autumn.

ENGLISH and French translations of the philosophical works of Friedrich Nietzsche are to appear simultaneously in London and Paris.

THE June number of Folk-lore will contain an article on 'Saga Growth, with especial reference to Egil's Saga,' by F. York Powell. Prof. E. Anichkov, of St. Petersburg, will contribute an essay on 'St. Nicholas and Artemis'; and Prof. W. P. Ker one on 'The Roman van Walewein.' Mr. Jacobs returns to the charge on the vexed question of 'The Problem of Diffusion.'

MR. SEPTIMUS RIVINGTON is going to insert some facsimiles of title-pages of early publications of the firm, issued from the Bible and the Crown, in his history of 'The Publishing House of Rivington.' Portraits of some of the eighteenth century Rivingtons will be added.

MR. T. E. HELLER is preparing an annotated edition of the new 'Evening Continuation School Code.' It will be modelled on his edition of the 'Code for Day Schools,' and will be published by Messrs. Bemrose & Sons.

A COMMITTEE has been formed at Munich and Würzburg for the purpose of collecting all the popular traditions, old customs, fairy tales, superstitions, &c., current now or in former days in Bavaria.

A "TRANSATLANTIC PUBLISHING COMPANY" has been formed in New York, under the literary superintendence of Mr. J. M. Stoddard, who for many years has edited Lippincott's Magazine. This company will issue a popular and scientific quarterly, and also a Transatlantic Magazine, consisting of short stories. The latter periodical is especially meant to offer English writers of short stories the means of copyrighting such productions in the United States by simultaneous publication in that country of stories printed in England.

KING CHARLES of Roumania has rewarded with high honours Dr. Schäffer, professor in the Darmstadt High School, for the compilation of memoirs of his Majesty's early life, beginning in 1848.

DR. MORRIS believes he has discovered in the Sutor Library at San Francisco the scroll of the Pentateuch written by the famous Maimonides. From the facsimile, however, which is appended to his pamphlet on the subject, we should rather date this scroll at the end of the fifteenth or beginning of the sixteenth century. Maimonides died in 1204 A.D. The characters belong to the Yemetic form of Hebrew, whilst Maimonides wrote in Hispanico-Hebrew characters.

THE death of Prof. Henry Morley has been speedily followed by that of Dr. Morris, a philologist by natural instinct, who, although he enjoyed few advantages in early life, did more to advance the study of Early English than any other man of his time, unless it be Prof. Skeat. His services to the Early English Text Society were beyond price, and on schoolboys he conferred a signal benefit by compiling his 'Historical Outlines of English Accidence'—the first volume of the kind that could be called scientific—while his 'Elementary Lessons in Historical English Grammar' and his selections from Chaucer have attained a very wide popularity. In his later life he devoted his chief attention to Pali, and worked zealously for the Pali Text Society. He was a quiet, modest man, who never put himself forward or advertised himself, and probably for this reason no Prime Minister ever dreamed of bestowing ecclesiastical preferment on one of the most learned clergymen of his age. He lived and died a schoolmaster, and even as a schoolmaster he never obtained any lucrative post; only in 1890, when his health was beginning to fail, was he appointed to the headship of a small grammar school in Essex.

WE can this week only mention with deep regret the decease of a woman of very noble character, Madame Ronan.

FOLLOWING his onslaught on the public who collect first editions and stamps, Mr. W. Roberts is contributing to the Fortnightly Review an article on 'The Worship of Pottery.'

THE Parliamentary Papers of this week include Estimate of Revenue and Expenditure of the Government of India for 1893-4, compared with the Results of 1892-3 (2d.); and Report of the Army Medical Department for 1892 (1s. 2d.).

SCIENCE

The Complete Angler. By Izaak Walton and Charles Cotton. Edited by J. E. Harting. 2 vols. (Bagster & Sons.)

IN 1882 Mr. Satchell, following the footsteps of Mr. Westwood in the 'Chronicle of the Compleat Angler,' enumerated no fewer than eighty-seven editions. Mr. Marston published his centenary edition in 1888, and several others have succeeded it. That and the edition of Sir Harris Nicolas in 1836 are among the most beautiful settings of the 'Compleat Angler.' To these must now be added the sumptuous book before us, which Mr. Harting styles "The Tercentenary Edition," because published on the tercentenary anniversary of Walton's birth. It is an admirable specimen of the Ballantyne Press as far as printing goes, while its tasteful binding, luxury of paper and margin, and the beautiful engravings and etchings which adorn it, stamp this charming edition as among the finest which do honour to the authors. Mr. Harting has followed other naturalists, such as Jesse and Kennie, in annotating the text. No small share of the glory of the authors is reflected, editors rightly think, upon themselves. It is possible, indeed, like Moses Browne, to obscure the text, or with Jesse, in Westwood's words, to "have to stand tip-toe to see Walton at all." Again, it is possible for an editor to efface his own personality and to add but few notes, and those strictly to the point. Among these model editors Mr. J. E. Harting may be confidently placed.

The diffuse life of Walton by Hawkins is here judiciously abbreviated, but Mr. Harting says nothing of Walton's first wife, Rachel Floud, who was maternally descended from Archbishop Cranmer. A further kinship to the Church resulted from Walton's second marriage to the sister of the saintly Bishop Ken. Nor has Mr. Harting corrected Hawkins's remarkable confusion of pronouns in his account of the will of Dr. Donne the younger, "whereby he bequeathed to the elder Walton all his father's writings, as also his commonplace book, which he says may be of use to him, if he makes him a scholar." As for the book itself, the editor follows judiciously the text of the fifth edition, the last published in the author's lifetime.

Mr. Harting's object in the bulk of his notes is to correct the false notions on zoology which were current in Walton's time, and are reflected in his book. This is what might be expected in a naturalist, but the lover of Walton is too often repelled by any notes. The delightfully innocent and unscientific mind of the father of anglers is dearer to such a one than the most careful modern accounts of the instincts of the otter or the habits of the eel. He prefers to believe in the river of Arabia which turns to a vermilion colour the fleeces of all the sheep that drink of it; in the fish called Balans, which in length and breadth covers more than two acres of ground; and in many more fabulous creatures whose existence is vouched for in the 'Compleat Angler,' rather than to be carefully informed by a note how much of these creatures is mythical, and what their true natures are. Mr. Harting will doubtless be shocked at the want of taste of such enthusiastic Walton-lovers, but so it is. It were unkind, however, to pass over his notes without a remark or two. The etymology of "stanyell," the word Walton uses for the kestrel, is not so certain as is here supposed; the verses which Walton ascribes to one Jo. Davors are now known to have been composed by John Denny, and merited a note from their excellence. But what should be said to the 'Milkmaid's Song' being here altered and shortened? Not even the fact that "the version which replaces it is that given in Percy's 'Reliques,' and is more likely to be correct, as being printed from the most authentic sources," can reconcile the angler to the change. As well amend Shakespeare's "Take, oh, take those lips away," from some newly discovered variant. It may be opined that Mr. Harting has not been brought up on the 'Compleat Angler,' or he could never have perpetrated this tasteless alteration. Nor was it necessary, when Tityrus under his beech tree is named in the text, to quote the Latin line, and to quote it—proh pudor—as

Several of the notes seem needless. The catkin of the willow is known as a "palm" in most districts of the west of England. Dubravus is adduced as an authority for the use of fishing boots, but Falstaff knew how to "liquor" them. Nor was it necessary in these days of elementary education to follow Hawkins in discriminating the Derbyshire from the Herefordshire Wyo. On the other hand, Mr. Harting is happy in his notes on Walton's flowers, such as "lady smocks" and "culverkeys"; and the biographical notices are mostly terse and to the point. That he would sympathize with Walton's Auceps and gladly explain any allusions in the text to hawks and hawking goes for granted. As was said above, if notes are necessary for the 'Compleat Angler,' probably no more judicious editor than Mr. Harting could have been selected.

Its engravings, however, are the distinctive feature of this edition, and they are numerous and varied. Of the etchings, Walton from Housman's celebrated picture, and Cotton from a painting by Sir P. Lely, are admirable. They appropriately form the frontispieces of the two volumes. Audinet's reproduction of Lely's work cannot be too much commended both for general effects and minute attention to detail. There are two etchings of the famous Pike Pool, which has so often been painted, one engraved by Greig and the other by Audinet. Each is praiseworthy as reflecting different moods of the scenery. Wales's well-known drawings lend the proper air of antiquity to the book, and are here reproduced. It is very evident to the practical fisherman that Wales was no angler, as in his picture of the grayling he represents Piscator, with rod in one hand, drawing the fish to land by the line held in the other. There are a few woodcuts (that of Tottenham High Cross being scarcely worthy of appearing in so fine a setting), and several of Linnell's paintings have been etched, although the sober black and white provokes a mental reference to the blaze of sunshine and colour which pervades the originals. All these plates are distinct ornaments of the book. Mr. Lodge's woodcuts of birds are decidedly clever, but he does not succeed so well with quadrupeds. The marten is not sufficiently characteristic; and although the otter does swim almost in a horizontal position, the creature would scarcely be recognized in the woodcuts here given. It would be unpardonable to pass over the beautiful series of fish etched by Audinet, which is placed at the end of the book; like Piscator's verses, "they be choicely good, and doubtless made by a lover of angling." The index is excellent; not merely a pretence, as in so many cases, but a most useful addition to a very complete book.

SOCIETIES.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—May 21.—Mr. C. R. Markham, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Major-General R. J. J. Stewart, Capt. A. H. H. Gibbons, Prof. C. Lapworth, Messrs. F. T. Gerrard, M. C. Keith, B. de Q. Quincey, and W. F. Teare.—The paper read was 'Expedition to the Hadramut,' by Mr. J. Theodore Bent.

BRITISH ARCHAEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—May 16.—Mr. A. Wyon in the chair.—The progress of the arrangements for holding this year's congress at Manchester was detailed.—Mr. Wells exhibited an ancient horseshoe of very peculiar form, having been made to encase the foot, to which it must have been secured by bands. It was found with objects of Roman date in Great Swan Alley, City.—Mr. Woods reported the execution of some excavations for water-pipes which had been carried through the old Roman gate on the Balcan Hill, Colchester, under his oversight, when the mode of forming the foundations was laid open to observation. No injury of any kind, but very much the reverse, has been done to the ancient work.—Mr. Barrett exhibited drawings of a curious window, formed of moulded brick, which still exists at the Victualing Yard, Deptford. It is dated 1513, and bears the initials of Henry VIII. He also described some of the old customs of the dressing of ancient wells, notably that at Tillington.—An elaborate paper on the ancient vitrified forts of Scotland, prepared by Miss Russell, of Galashiels, was read, in her absence, by Mr. Loftus Brock. The various specimens in the country were described in detail, and the theories of their formation passed in review.—In the discussion which ensued, Dr. Phené referred to the existence of vitrified forts in Hungary and in many other countries, and produced a fragment of basalt melted and joined to sandstone from a fort in Brittany, where walls of internal buildings as well as the external walls of the fort had been formed by the action of fire.—Dr. Winstone and other speakers referred to the properties of culm and other seaweeds to form a flux, and suggested that it was used in the constructions under review. The few specimens of vitrified forts in England were mentioned.

NUMISMATIC.—May 17.—Sir J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. H. Montagu exhibited an aureus in fine condition of Julia Titi, with the figure of a peacock on the reverse, and two others bearing the portraits of Julia and her father Titus. One specimen of the last two is unpublished in gold.—A discussion took place on the paper on Anglo-Saxon coins which had been read by Mr. H. A. Grueber at the previous meeting of the Society.—Sir J. Montagu drew attention to the discovery of four coins of Wulf, King of Mercia, which he thought proved that the coinage of that king extended over a longer period than has been generally supposed. He also pointed out the fact that some of the coins of Ecgbeorht not only bear the names of moneyers of Baldred of Kent, but that Ecgbeorht borrowed some of the types of that king for his own coinage.—Sir J. Evans, in his remarks, expressed his opinion that he could not agree with Mr. Grueber in his attribution to Rochester of certain coins of Coenwulf, Ceolwulf I., and Beornwulf of Mercia, on account of their having a cross or crosses on the reverses in the form of that of St. Andrew. He also took exception to Mr. Grueber's solution of the inscription on the reverse of a coin of Beornwulf, which the writer interpreted as 'Tidbeorht Monetarius Urbis Cantuariorum,' but of which the initial only of each word was given.—Col. L. Ellis communicated a paper on the currency of the Straits Settlements, in which he gave an historical account of that coinage. He divided the coins into five classes, viz., (1) those struck by the East India Company and bearing the Company's arms; (2) those bearing the bantam cock on the obverse; (3) those with the names of the States of the Malay Peninsula; (4) those with the name of Sumatra and the Sumatra States; and, lastly, miscellaneous pieces issued by the traders. The whole coinage extended over a period of about thirty years only, viz., from 1804 to 1834.

STATISTICAL.—May 22.—Sir R. W. Rawson in the chair.—A paper was read by Dr. J. Macdonell 'On Statistics of Litigation in England and Wales since 1859.'

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—May 22.—Mr. A. Giles, President, in the chair.—It was announced that the Council had recently transferred nine gentlemen to the class of Members, and had admitted thirteen as Students. The last ballot of the session resulted in the election of two Members, and of twenty-eight Associate Members.—Two papers were read dealing with recent developments in the construction of ferry steamers; the first entitled 'Recent Types of Ferry Steamers,' by Mr. A. Brown, and the second, 'On the Birkenhead Ferry-Boats Wirral and Mersey,' by Mr. C. Jones, of Liverpool.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.
 Mon. Geographical, 2.—Anniversary Meeting.
 — Navy, 2.—Institution 2.—Annual Meeting.
 — Helms, 5.—Greek Head in the possession of Mr. Y. H. Ward. Miss E. Sellers, 'Paintings of Pharaohs,' Mr. E. A. Gardner.
 — Institute of British Architects, 8.—'The Influence of the Hancault League on the Architecture of Northern Europe,' Mr. J. I. Perry.
 Tues. Royal Institution, 2.—'The Modern Microscope,' Dr. W. H. Dallinger.
 — Civil Engineers 6.—Annual Meeting.
 — History of Arts 8.—'Black and White in Africa and the East,' Mr. W. A. Wallis.

 Sat. Royal Institution, 2.—'The Stage and Society,' Mr. K. W. Lowe.
 — Zoological, 4.—'Sketches in Geographical Distribution,' Mr. F. R. Sedgwick.

Science Society.

UNDER the direction of the Bridge House Estates Committee an exhaustive account of the Tower Bridge and other Thames bridges erected by the Corporation of London, and including the history of the Bridge House and its committee from the twelfth century, has been prepared by Mr. Charles Welch, F.S.A., the Librarian to the Corporation. The work, which will include a description of the structure by Mr. Wolfe Barry and an introduction by Canon Benham, will form a quarto containing some forty illustrations, about half of them illustrating the works of the Tower Bridge in various stages of progress. There will also be a reproduction in chromo-lithography of the earliest view of the Tower and London Bridge, from a MS. in the British Museum dated 1500; a drawing of the Tower Bridge by Mr. W. L. Wyllie, A.R.A.; views of old and new London and Blackfriars Bridges, Billingsgate, Traitors' Gate, &c.; and three plates of reproductions from the records. A chapter on the antiquarian features of the locality, City pageants on the Thames, &c., will be furnished by Mr. Philip Norman, F.S.A. Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. will have the work ready for publication by the date of the opening of the Tower Bridge.

SIR JOSEPH LISTER having definitely retired from active hospital and teaching work, his former colleagues and pupils have determined to present him with a testimonial in the form of a portrait. A strong committee has been formed, of which Dr. Playfair is chairman and Dr. Silk honorary secretary. On the committee there are, among others, Sir Hugh Boever, Prof. Jeffrey Bell, Principal Caird, Prof. Cheyne, Sir George Johnson, Sir W. Priestley, Profs. Grainger Stewart and W. Stirling, the Principal of King's College, and Dr. Woodhead.

ALTHOUGH he had long been in a precarious state of health, the news of the sudden death of Mr. Romanos will be a great shock to his many friends. There is not time for us to speak this week of his work as a man of science and an exponent of evolution, but we hope to recur to the subject.

GALE'S comet (β , 1894), which was visible to the naked eye in the early part of the month, has diminished to less than the brightness which it had at the time of discovery. It is now in the southern part of Ursa Major, and on the 29th inst. will be about 20° due south of β , so that the pointers will indicate its position in the reverse direction to that of the pole star.

TEMPLE'S second periodical comet (c , 1894) was observed at Algiers on the 11th inst. (three days after it was detected at the Cape) by M. Trépied, who describes it as "une nébuleuse faible, paraissant elliptique, avec noyau." Its place for to-night (May 26th) is, according to M. Schulhof's ephemeris, R. A. 0° 40', N.P.D. 91° 33', and will be on the 31st R.A. 0° 55', N.P.D. 90° 42'.

FINE ARTS

THE GRAFTON GALLERIES.

(First Notice.)

THIS exhibition of pictures of women, not by any means all of whom are fair or even comely, extends from the unknown Greco-Egyptian portrait-painter in distemper, whose works are found in tombs of the second century of our era, to the masters of the present day. It may be considered a success. No doubt a very large proportion of the portraits are anything but novelties. In the nature of things this was inevitable, and what is more serious, several of the older works are wrongly named, and besides there are a great number of dull and ugly portraits that no one wishes to see. With that generosity which characterizes English owners of works of art, several of our best-known amateurs have contributed freely, and the large cases are crowded with relics of all sorts, besides scores of charming miniatures, which are of great value on every account. There is, indeed, a superabundance of objects to look at, and not one but a dozen visits would be required to do justice to the whole collection. In fact, the materials of several exhibitions are needlessly heaped together, owing to the kindness of lenders. Her Majesty is, as usual on such occasions, an eminently liberal contributor; hardly less so are Mr. Bischoffsheim, Lord and Lady Castletown, Sir F. Cook, Lord De L'Isle, the Duke of Devonshire, and many others.

The Catalogue does not deserve its title. In spite of a few exceptional notes, introduced without the least attempt at system, it is a mere list of names of owners, painters, and pictures, and so devoid of details that not even the measurements, so useful for identifying examples, are stated. It is dear at a shilling, and might well be sold for threepence.

We may begin with the small half-length figure said to be a Holbein and to represent Henry VIII.'s sister, the thrice-wedded Margaret, Queen of Scotland (No. 2), lately lent by Lord Lothian to the Academy and the Stuart Exhibition. As we remarked in 1889, it cannot have been painted before 1516, when the princess was twenty-seven years of age and Holbein twenty-one, i.e., long before he had anything to do with England, nor later than 1522, when her face suffered from small-pox. Accordingly, it is not included in trustworthy lists of Holbeins. There were men in England besides Holbein who were capable of painting like this. It is certainly not a French picture, and the black embroidery on the white sleeves is known as English. Yet nothing can be more beautiful than the execution of the embroideries, jewels, the ardent yet languishing eyes (so true to Margaret's character), firm plump lips, finely pencilled eyebrows, and the very Holbein-like hands. The headdress is a marvel of finished drawing and modelling of the soundest quality. Consequently we are inclined to think that the picture is a Holbein, and that it belongs to a later stage of his career than the lady's age indicates. However this may be, there can be no question that the famous Christina, Duchess of Milan (4) (Tudor Exhibition, 1890, No. 92), which the Duke of Norfolk has, for a time only, we hope, removed from the National Gallery, where it has long been on loan, is a genuine Holbein.—Close to it hangs the so-called La bella Simonetta (5) of Botticelli, which was ately at the Academy.—No. 6, the seated figure of a damsel in a red velvet bodice, is said to be a Lucas de Heere, but we do not believe this, for it is more like a German picture, or possibly a Bernard van Orley; it is certainly not a portrait of Lady Jane Grey, but a Mary Magdalen, whose traditional vase of gold stands on a table at her side. It was at South Kensington in 1866.

The beautiful colour and masculine modelling and style of Pordenone's Isabella d'Este (7) mark a very different phase of painting. The high breeding of her noble face is no less delightful than the fineness of the flesh throughout and the colour at large.—Lorenzo Lotto's Lucretia (9), lent by Capt. Holford, we lately dealt with at length when it was at the Academy, and so was the charming Titian Catarina Cornaro (12).—Mr. Benson has lent a capital Portrait of a Lady (13) as a Luini. The shadows of the highly polished flesh have darkened; the calm repose of the figure and features and the exhaustive modelling and drawing favour its ascription to Luini. Certainly it is a fine specimen of Milanese portraiture. Like Catarina Cornaro this lady holds a mar-moset or squirrel by a chain, which in Catarina's portrait is attached to her bracelet.—Beyond all question No. 14 is not a portrait of Mary, Queen of Scots, nor is Queen Elizabeth the "Diana" of No. 17.—When Mr. Joseph's Portrait of the Painter's Wife (18) was lately at the Academy, ascribed as now to Rembrandt, we felt convinced it was by F. Bol. We still think so.—The so-called Frank Hals, Maria Voogt Claasdr (16), has been spoilt by an excess of varnish, and looks like a Jan Van Ravens-stein. Compare No. 20, A Dutch Lady, which is certainly by the latter.—Admirers of Vermeer should not overlook Mr. Biehoffshelm's Girl playing the Guitar (19), although it is an inferior specimen of that interesting master.—Very curious is the portrait by Janet of Diane de Poitiers (20), seated in her bath.

Quite another sort of painting is represented by Lord De L'Isle's Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke (21), by M. Gheeraerts, a stiff and dry picture, yet full of character and sweetness.—Elizabeth de Valois (23), by Antonio More, is one of the noblest portraits of any age, remarkable for the character of the features and the curious elaboration of the costume. To the same painter is ascribed the Lady Helen Kerr, now much rubbed, but formerly excellent.—Bronzino's (?) Eleanor d'Este (26) is painted on that undesirable material, lead.—Coello's Isabella Clara Eugenia, Infanta (28), is noteworthy.—No. 31 is one of Honthorst's numerous portraits of Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia.—The noble Rembrandt lent by the Queen, here called La Femme à l'Éventail (34), better known as the 'Lady at the Window,' was lately at the Academy.—With Kneller's Duchess of Marlborough (3), the best and most agreeable portrait of Sarah Jennings, it contrasts so very curiously that it is hardly possible to believe the two artists were contemporaries for over twenty years.—The Zurbaran, A Spanish Lady as St. Elizabeth of Hungary (38), is one of the most interesting portraits in the gallery, very sweet and fresh, and still in harmony with itself, although the blue bodice has faded.—Rubens's Anne of Austria (46) looks as if it had been over-cleaned some years ago. Lately at the Academy, it may be accepted as a school picture only.—The same criticism applies to a Van Dyck, Lady Tufton (50), dressed in black, from Newbottle. On the other hand, there is no room for doubt about Lord Wantage's Henrietta Maria (51) in a white silk dress, embroidered in silver.—The girlish Princess Mary as Diana (39), from Hampton Court, is a well-known example of Lely's middle period. The flesh painting is indifferent, and it is far inferior to his superb Comtesse de Grammont (47) with the palm, one of the few Lelys signed with his monogram of "P. L." The Countess of Oxford (43), also by Lely, is a replica, or copy, of the well-known picture "with the melting eyes." Mrs. Jane Middleton (45), by Lely (?), is not nearly so good as her portrait in the National Portrait Gallery. It is in the original frame. She is depicted as a Mary Magdalen, a character she did not emulate, except in painting.—On the other hand, The Marchioness of Granby (41), wife of the general, from Belvoir, is an admirable Hogarth.—The Countess of Sunderland (54), as a sort of Dresden shepherdess, may be a Dolson, but its style and the lady's age are against its being a Van Dyck, which the Catalogue says it is.—Greuze's Head of a Girl (55) is well known, and the Girl's Head (58), by the same, and Mr. Knowles's charming Portrait (71) are also excellent examples of the painter.

One of the soundest and most accomplished pictures here, an example so pure in colour and lightly touched that it closely resembles a work of the Anglo-Italian Eastlake, is Allan Ramsay's portrait of Lady Susan Fox-Strangways (56), the same who afterwards ran away with O'Brien the actor, to the ineffable disgust of her family, and went with him to America, where "something had to be done" for the young couple. Bright, soft, and good as it is, this picture so much surpasses the average of Ramsay's productions that one can hardly help fancying that the cleaning and varnishing processes to which it has been subjected have been exceptionally beneficial. It looks more like a Cotes than a Ramsay. The lady's bodice, doubtless that worn at the royal wedding, when she was one of Queen Charlotte's bridesmaids, is No. 105 in the class of miniatures and relics. Not far from No. 56 hangs one of the most famous of Reynolds's, the whole-length nudity The Nymph (59), sometimes called 'Venus and Cupid.' It is the work which, in accordance with Sir Joshua's will, the present owner's ancestor, Lord Upper-Ossory, the father of 'Collina,' whose even more famous portrait is No. 90 on the other side of the gallery here, chose as a souvenir from among the painter's unsold works. The picture has been engraved by J. Collyer, D. Raimbach, and others. It was at the Academy in 1875 and at the Grosvenor Gallery in 1884. The roses have gone from the flesh painting, but the picture has been creditably taken care of. On the other hand, The Snake in the Grass (65), also a well-known Reynolds, after long being in a very bad state, has been extensively repaired, and is now almost a modern picture. The Duchess of Rutland (60), by Reynolds, must not be confused with that other duchess by him which was burnt at Belvoir in 1812, and of which a copy, from the Duke of Rutland's collection, is now at Guildhall. That before us, which belongs to the Duke of Beaufort, is a late picture, and illustrates the painter's declining powers and loose touch. The duchess herself was the rival, social and political, of the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire, and although she was in her prime when she sat to Reynolds, she survived till 1831.—The Gainborough, Mary (born Bruce), Duchess of Richmond (62), is good, though the flesh has darkened a great deal.—Next to it hangs Sir Joshua's portrait, from Belvoir, of Frances (born Manners), Countess of Tyrconnel (63), daughter of the martial Marquis of Granby. She sat in this affected manner to the painter in 1764 and 1766, and wears the white pseudo-classic drapery which the artist often introduced in portraits of ladies, as Romney, too, did at that time. Though the flesh is slightly faded it is otherwise but little altered, and the countess's cheeks retain a suspicion of rouge, and the almost Hals-like modelling of the features en bloc is noteworthy as illustrating Sir Joshua's skill in massing details and forms. The landscape background is extremely clever and good.—That Elizabeth (born Hervey), Duchess of Devonshire (68), the charming widow of Mr. Foster, who bewitched Gibbon and the Lord Chancellor himself, should have sat to Angelica Kauffmann to be painted in the feeble manner of No. 68, and afterwards to Sir Joshua for the supremely attractive No. 86, is one of the mysteries of portrait painting. Most effectually does it show Angelica's incompetence as well as her lack of insight into character. No. 86 was at the Academy in 1788 as 'A Lady of Quality,' at the British Institution in 1813, the International Exhibition in 1862, the Academy again in 1877, the Grosvenor Gallery in 1884, the Guelph Exhibition in 1891, and at the Guildhall in 1892. Of this much exhibited picture there is a print by Bartolozzi, which is poorer than most of his female portraits. Somebody said she was "as wilful as the devil." See what Romney made of her in No. 130.—Hoppner's comely and thoroughly English wife, with her sunny eyes and happy expression, is immortalized upon her husband's canvas, No. 72, and deserves to be studied thoroughly.

THE SALONS. (Second Notice.)

SINCE the pernicious school of Fontainebleau, composed of the "tail" of the Italian Renaissance, already entirely fallen into decay, covered with mythological paintings, torsos uselessly heroic, and gestures vainly Michaelangelesque or weakly elegant, the walls and ceilings of the palaces of the kings of France, many very bad decorative paintings have been executed, and a tradition and an æsthetic have established themselves which still oppress several artists of our time. To judge by the ceilings to be seen at the old Salon which are intended for some provincial mairie or some private dwelling, whether the subject be La Couronne de Tondoue (No. 536) or the Apothéose de Guttenberg (1509), in which MM. Debat-Ponsan and Quinsac have introduced all the Fames and customary allegories, we may admit that the old academism is not quite dead, and that here and there figures like La Perle of M. Bouguereau (248)—which I mention in preference to others because he is the master of the school, and places great qualities as a draughtsman at the service of a formal and conventional art—prove, if not the vitality, at least the survival of the style. It is, too, only fair to acknowledge that to a painter forced to represent on a ceiling themes so unreal as the apotheosis of Guttenberg the old formulae of the classic répertoire offer a convenient resource. All the choir of antique Fames is at the disposal of the unlucky artist; the inevitable trumpets fix themselves of their own accord on the "immortal" lips, and, with the minimum of invention possible, the commission is executed.

Invited also to celebrate on a ceiling for the Hôtel de Ville of Paris the Triomphe de l'Art (224), M. Bonnat has not put himself to too great pains to invent. The faithful Pegasus has not ceased to champ the classic barley in the studios of the École des Beaux-Arts, and once more M. Bonnat has opened the stable door and let the divine steed loose in the arena. The manner of the robust artist is not exactly serious. All that he does is solid, massive, modelled in a large style, in an impasto into the composition of which enter phosphate of lime and the wine of Bannys. You know that he was born close to the Spanish frontier. He loves heavy materials, and a certain roughness is not unwelcome to him. Yet if the design be not reconditæ nor particularly poetical, the execution is powerful and the movement is finely lyrical. Pegasus, quite white with light, and splashed with gold reflection, bounds impetuously through the ether. A genius, holding aloft the torch symbolic of art, is seated on his crupper. He leaps from an escarped rock, while at his feet the genii of evil and of night are rolling into the abysses, and beyond the roddish and yellow vapours that surround him stretches the blue sky. The piece, treated in a large style, and painted with a passionate energy, has an attractive air, and the hand and conviction of the master have imparted to it the sacred fire which his imagination by itself would have been unable to communicate.

A quite different kind of art and inspiration characterizes the decorations which M. Puvion de Chavannes exhibits at the Champ de Mars, and which he has painted for the principal staircase of the same Hôtel de Ville. The subject proposed was La Glorification de la Ville de Paris (1934). The central motif selected by M. Puvion de Chavannes for the ceiling was exhibited last year in the shape of a cartoon in camaiéu. This is how the artist himself explained it in a notice written by himself:—

"La Ville de Paris, couronnée par les lettres, les sciences et les arts, agréés l'hommage du chantre immortel qui l'a célébrée. Victor Hugo, la main sur la lyre que tient un génie, la lui présente; à sa suite apparaît un trio de figures volantes, symbolisant l'essence même de son œuvre: poésie lyrique, légende des siècles ou roman, Drame ou les châtimens. Sous un portique, un groupe d'éphèbes brandit des palmes; l'un d'eux tient l'étendard aux armées de Paris....."

When the cartoon made its appearance at the Champ de Mars in 1893, there was some hesitation on the part of the public, and even among the friends of M. Puvion de Chavannes a little uneasiness. It was the first time the painter had consented to paint a ceiling, and he seemed ill at ease in this branch of art, of which the paradoxical conditions are contrary to good sense. To-day his composition—slightly modified, and above all invested with the persuasive charm of colour—has an eloquence altogether new. The great sky of turquoise blue, divided horizontally by slight clouds of dead gold, the carpet of ash-grey grass bestarred with pale flowers, the slow ascent of the golden palms waved by the ephèbi, the clear and soft harmonies of the draperies, compose a serene and triumphal symphony, of which one can foresee that the effect, when it is put in its proper position, will be powerful and tranquil, as every monumental decoration ought to be. It is a great mistake, yet one into which a large number of painters have fallen since the Italian Renaissance, to multiply on the walls of our edifices academic nudités and glaring colours under pretext of beauty, style, or allegory. I should gladly say to them, "Above all, not too many figures, not too many objects, not too much noise. What is required is repose, harmony, serenity; of them we have more need now than ever, swept along and tossed about as we are in a torrent of bustling and busy life. Evoke for us visions of peace; let us see in your decorations nature presented in a salutary contemplation. Signify, sum up, synthesize. We are not naturalists, curious of morsels of anatomy: we are not athletes, admirers of herculean muscle and of curved torsos. You will produce in vain and without interesting us more Titans and Herculeses than that insupportable Giulio Romano has crowded together on the walls of the Palazzo del T. at Mantua. Rather seek to introduce floating along the surface of the wall unruffled figures, and seemingly distant, in which our reveries find material and support: our longing for harmony a satisfaction."

Puvion de Chavannes has been raised up by Providence to answer this craving of many of his contemporaries, insensible to all the academics of the school. To complete the decoration of the staircase of the Hôtel de Ville, and to encircle the principal subject, he has had to fill fifteen compartments (vaults and tympana), which he has distributed as follows:—In the vaults Foyer intellectuel, Ardeur artistique, Charité, Patriotisme; he has yet to design Paris, Moyen Age, and Paris Moderne. For the tympana, Euphrat, Générosité, Fontaine, Beauté, Culte du Souvenir, Intériorité, Urbanité; the two that remain to be executed are Renommée and Industrie. At the outset the eye and the mind are attracted by a great general impression, by the unity of the composition, and they are thus won over to favour the work. Then, as he examines one by one each of the scenes in which the painter has expressed his idea, the visitor becomes impressed with all that they contain in a concentrated form of simple truth and grandeur. The charm of this art lies in the fact that it is at once very classical and altogether outside of the commonplace formulae and hackneyed repertoire of allegories classified and ticketed for the last three hundred years in the warehouses of decorative art. It is nature and life reflected, arranged, and condensed in a noble spirit which contemplates rather than looks. It seems as if one could, without notable error, restore all the interior workings by which the idea and the image were developed and combined in the artist's mind before they were fixed irrevocably on the canvas.

It is not by the subtlety of symbols, the rarity of the attributes, the ingenious nature of the literary allusions, that a plastic work can touch us. It must not be either a vague abstraction, or a riddle, or an enigma. The problem is to combine in an action of the simplest nature, and a decorative unity of the most expressive kind, the principal characters, the most elementary of the ideas and forms selected. For a picture of Charity it may be enough to introduce a famishing infant clasped to its mother's bosom under the misery of a cold day, and a look of protection and pity which a veiled woman casts upon the shivering child and mother: for Patriotism a man who, flag in hand, has received the word of command from his country. With one hand she touches the folds of the banner, with the other she shows him the distant end, while a genius by her side holds the palm and crown—consecration of triumph or martyrdom—in all cases his duty accomplished. For Urbanity an aged woman plucks a flower which, with a charming gesture full of nobility and simplicity, she is on the point of offering to another younger woman. (Alas! allegory and satire are equally just. Urbanity has white hair! It is already the virtue and charm of an elder day.) It is impossible to enter upon details of these fifteen compositions, and, besides, words are unable to express what of beauty and persuasion the rhythm of a line, the eloquent simplicity of a gesture, the nobility of a hanging drapery, can convey. The movements are always borrowed from nature and from life, but are deprived of all that they may contain of the accidental and the individual, to be reduced to the most simplified and the most generalized form possible. Likewise all that regards the detail of the costumes preserves an intentionally general character. It is not exactly modern costume, nor is it, on the other hand, antique drapery, but a sort of compromise between the two by means of which the present is as it were exalted "hors des temps," as Victor Hugo says, into the domain of the absolute.

That which is of importance, and is here fully realized, is that all the lines, all the forms, the symphonic concert of all the notes of colour (which co-ordinate under one dominant note of blue of a violet shade upon gold), resolve themselves into a general harmony and a general rhythm which betray no trace of indecision to eye or mind. "Novelty in painting," Poussin said, "does not consist in a subject which no one has seen depicted before, but in the good and new disposition of the expression: a common subject, hackneyed although it be, may become new and singular.....To invent in art is to discover harmonies proper to that art; it is to think in that art." It would seem that we cannot better apply the words (often ill understood) of the master of "classical" painting than to the art of Puvion de Chavannes, whose originality and power really consist in being at once very classical and very modern. All the qualities of "composition," of reflection, dear to the genius of the race, are in him in their highest expression. He certainly belongs to the country of Bossuet and Buffon. And at the same time, beyond the academic formulae and calligraphy from which he has liberated himself, he gives us something of the spirit of the old masters: decorators of our cathedrals and founders of the French tradition—"opus Francigenum"—French and not Latin nor Roman, with which it has often been confounded; and it chances that the spirit of our ancestors is in intimate accord with the most profound and most noble tendencies of the modern spirit, and responds to the aspirations of contemporary art, disheartened by the excesses and follies of realism no less than by the insipid falsehoods of formal and academic idealism—eager to reconcile in a new synthesis and a living symbol these two eternal coefficients of all æsthetic creation, the idea and the image, the form and the spirit.

Fine-Art Society.

MR. POYNTER having taken up his duties at the National Gallery, it may be interesting to state Sir F. Burton, his immediate predecessor, held the office during near twenty years, until the 25th of March last, the longest of any tenures of the post.

THE Burlington Fine-Arts Club having, as we mentioned some weeks ago, made a large collection of works by masters of the schools of Ferrara and Bologna, has appointed Tuesday next, the 29th inst., for the opening of the gallery to all who obtain tickets from members. The pictures will remain on view until Saturday, the 28th of July.

TO-DAY (Saturday) is appointed for the private view of the summer exhibition (the thirty-second) of the 19th Century Art Society, at the Conduit Street Galleries; the exhibition will be opened to the public on Monday, the 28th inst.

THE annual meeting, for the election of officers and Council, and for the adoption of the report of the Council of the Hellenic Society, will be held on the afternoon of Monday, June 18th.

YET another monograph on Stonehenge. Mr. E. Barclay intends to bring out a monograph on 'Stonehenge and its Earthworks,' designed as a handbook for persons visiting Stonehenge and also as a book of reference for the library. A ground plan of Stonehenge, from the survey of Prof. Flinders Petrie, will be given, and five views of it as it appears from the earth circle, each stone having its number clearly marked above it. A reduced reproduction of the two views in Inigo Jones's work and a plan of the earthworks from the Ordnance Survey will be added. There will also be reproductions of some paintings exhibited in Conduit Street by the author a couple of years ago.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made for the opening of an exhibition of the work of Glasgow artists in the Continental Gallery in New Bond Street on June 1st.

MESSRS. CANSSELL & Co.'s twelfth annual black-and-white exhibition will be held at the Cutlers' Hall, Warwick Lane, from May 31st to June 16th inclusive.

THE new volume of the "Gentleman's Magazine Library" announced by Mr. Elliot Stock will contain the contributions to the Magazine on ecclesiology.

MISS KINGSEY will deliver, at the Queen's Hall, Langham Place, a series of lectures about French pictures and painters of the nineteenth century, on the 1st, 8th, 15th, 22nd, and 29th prox., at 5 o'clock P.M. on each day.

THE Salon will be closed on Monday next, the 28th inst.—that day only—on account of the voting for medals to be awarded to exhibitors.

M. FALGOUTRE is executing a bust of M. Renan, which is to be placed in the French Institut.

THE competition for a new French postage stamp having proved a failure, the matter is to be dropped.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

QUEEN'S HALL.—Royal Academy Commemoration Concert. Herr Mottl's Concert.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Musical Union.
ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—Production of Verdi's 'Falstaff.'

THE completion of the seventieth year of work at the Royal Academy of Music was celebrated somewhat tardily, though not unworthily, at the Queen's Hall on Thursday last week. Nothing was done of a nature to demand lengthy criticism, but the programme was interesting from the fact that those who took part in it included several performers who, originally students at Tenterden Street, have now attained a measure of celebrity. This affords some idea of its usefulness, and further testimony may be afforded by the mention of such names as those of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sterndale Bennett, George Macfarren, Mr. Walter Macfarren, Sir Joseph Barnby, Mr. Edward German, Goring Thomas, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Miss Valérie White, Mr. F. Corder, and last, but not least, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, who were represented in various capacities in the programme. Among the vocalists were Madame Clara Samuel, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Arthur Oswald, as well as some promising present students, including Mrs. Florence Bethell (soprano), Mr. Gerald Walenn (violinist), and Mr. Brozel (baritone). The concert ended with a new nautical overture of a somewhat humorous nature by Dr. Mackenzie, entitled 'Britannia,' in which snatches of favourite airs are cleverly interwoven with original matter.

Much to the delight of many hundred amateurs, Herr Felix Mottl was enabled to accept a second engagement for a concert in London this season, which took place at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening. The Carlruhe Capellmeister is as celebrated as a conductor of Berlioz as he is of Wagner, and the programme of this week's concert included some items by the French master. These were the Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini,' and two of the instrumental movements from the 'Roméo et Juliette' Symphony. They were all given with brilliant effect, and, indeed, we have never heard the music of Berlioz more eloquently interpreted. Herr Mottl's reading of Beethoven's Symphony in c minor was striking, and in one or two places open to argument. He is fond of strong accents and indulgence in the tempo rubato, and these peculiarities manifested themselves in somewhat startling fashion in the first and second movements. On the whole, however, it was a splendid performance. The Wagnerian selections were the Prelude to the third act, and Hans Sachs's monologue, "Wahn! Wahn!" from 'Die Meistersinger,' the latter excerpt expressively sung by Mr. David Bispham; 'Siegfried's Rheinfahrt' and the 'Trauermarsch' from 'Götterdämmerung'; the 'Siegfried Idyll,' of which a beautiful rendering was given; and the 'Huldigungsmarsch.' The Queen's Hall was again crowded in every part, and it is evident that Herr Mottl has at once been taken into favour by London amateurs, who are usually slow to appreciate new-comers. It is to be hoped that an opportunity may be found next season for him to appear as a conductor of entire works of Berlioz and Wagner in an opera-house.

The new "Musical Union," inaugurated by M. Johannes Wolff on Monday afternoon, resembles in only one respect the enjoyable performances given for many years by the late John Ella. The services of the best performers and composers in the department of classical chamber music are to be secured from abroad; but the well-remembered arrangement of placing a platform for the artists in the centre of the room, with the select audience grouped around, is not followed. Perhaps the time for this exclusiveness has expired, but, at any rate, M. Wolff elects to give his performances under ordinary concert conditions, and at the first he was supported by a large audience. French music supplied the foundation of Monday's scheme, the composer chiefly represented being M. Charles Marie Widor, whose music strongly reflects the modern school of Germany. His Symphony in A was performed at the Crystal Palace in March, 1887, and we were constrained to speak of it in somewhat unfavourable terms, owing to the dryness and straining after effects which characterized it generally (Athen. No. 3100). The same faults may be found, though in less degree, in the Pianoforte Quartet in A minor, three duet pieces for piano and violoncello, and a Quintet for the curious combination of flute, piano, harmonium, violin, and violoncello, which were played on Monday with the aid of the composer, who appears to be an able pianist as he is certainly an admirable organist, and Messrs. Wolff, van Waefelghem, Delsart, Aitken, and W. L. Barrett. That charming pianist and composer Mlle. Chaminade took part in the concert, but her talent was not displayed to so much advantage in a Pianoforte Trio in A minor from her pen as in three of her piquant and graceful songs, which were effectively rendered by Madame Julia Wyman. Four songs by M. Widor, impressively sung by M. Oudin, also proved, on the whole, more pleasing than his instrumental music. M. Saint-Saëns will take part in the second concert, which is fixed for the 7th prox.

The notice supplied by a correspondent from Milan when Verdi's 'Falstaff' was first produced in February last year (Athen. No. 3408) absolves us from the task of describing the work at length on its production in London last Saturday. It was truly said at the time that the virility of the octogenarian Italian maestro was little short of miraculous, and it may be added that the most amazing feature in the score is the expression of youthfulness. In this respect it is absolutely unique in the history of music. Several of the most gifted masters died before attaining their fortieth year, and even among those who reached old age we cannot recall a single instance in which any of their best work was created after they reached threescore years and ten. But in Giuseppe Verdi we have a composer who, at an age when most men are resting from life's toil, makes a new departure, and, in place of writing melodramatic and deeply tragic operas, displays a youthful spirit of optimism, and presents the world with a comic work unsurpassed by any previously penned with the exception of 'Die Meistersinger.' The only resemblance between the two lies in the humorous treatment alike in the vocal and orchestral part-writing, for Wagner develops his thematic material and makes the whole score homogeneous, whereas Verdi gives us melodies (mostly of a mirthful nature, but occasionally sentimental) with prodigality, one replacing another with almost irritating persistency. Next to the freshness of the music must be placed the purely Italian grace with which the voice parts are phrased and the sparkle and variety of the orchestration, Verdi making his instruments converse in delightful fashion. An opera founded on a Shakespearean subject treated in clever style—for Boito has exhibited as much skill in this libretto as he did in that of 'Otello'—combined with music abounding in every quality which makes for success, must inevitably make its mark eventually, though perhaps in the middle of a busy season it may not receive the attention it deserves. The production at Covent Garden has some features which may be mentioned in favourable terms. Signor Pessina is, in every respect, a worthy substitute for M. Maurel, who created the titular part in 'Falstaff.' He possesses an agreeable voice, of sufficient volume for Covent Garden, and his conception of the role shows intelligence above the average. He will be gladly witnessed in other impersonations. Next to him must be placed Signor Beduschi as Fenton, Signor Pini-Corsi as Ford, and Signorina Giulia Ravogli as Dame Quickly. Considering the difficulties in preparing two important new works in one week, the general presentation last Saturday was exceedingly creditable. 'Falstaff' may, perchance, not prove an immediate triumph, but it is in the highest degree unlikely that the work will be placed on the shelf for many years to come.

Musical Gossip.

It is neither possible nor desirable to notice all the concerts for which invitations come to hand at the present time, though many which must now be ignored would command attention at a less busy period of the year. On Friday afternoon last week Miss Fanny Davies gave her annual concert with the assistance of Signor Piatti. Miss Davies was heard to much advantage in Schumann's 'Waldscenen,' Op. 82, which are too rarely played, and various pieces by Bach, Sterndale Bennett, Brahms, and other composers, besides joining the Italian violin-cellist in Beethoven's Duet Sonata in D, Op. 102, No. 2.

The concert at which Madame Patti appears at the Albert Hall do not, as a rule, call for mention in this place, but that of last Saturday was an exception, as it should be placed on record that, for the first time in her career, the prima donna sang an item by Wagner. This was the exquisite little song 'Träume,' one of the 'Fünf Gedichte,' and her rendering certainly revealed new beauties in the composition by reason of the beauty of tone and delicate phrasing which Madame Patti imparted. The Welsh Ladies' Choir from Cardiff, under the direction of Madame Clara Novello Davies, took effective part in the entertainment.

On Saturday afternoon at St. James's Hall Josef Hofmann gave his third recital, but not his last, as originally announced, one more being arranged for June 9th. The pianist gave a brilliant and expressive rendering of Schubert's Fantasia in C, Op. 15, and was also highly commendable in items by Couperin, Rameau, and Chopin, the rendering of the last-named composer's Fantasia in F minor being especially excellent.

Herr FRITZ MASBACH, a new pianist, gave a recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, and played a sonata of Beethoven and various smaller compositions carefully, but not in very striking fashion, his style being rather cold, though perfectly sound and conscientious. Herr Masbach is young, and should improve in due course.—M. Rislér gave a second piano recital at the Princes' Hall on Wednesday afternoon; and simultaneously Miss Mathilde Verne and Miss Ethel Barns gave their second piano and violin recital, which was eminently successful artistically speaking, though details are not required.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

GARRICK.—Revival of 'Money.' By Edward, Lord Lytton.
COURT.—'Married,' a Comedy in Three Acts, by Brandon Thomas; and 'The Cape Mail,' from the French by Clement Scott.

At what period of its life does a play, originally intended as a sketch of contemporary life, take rank as a costume play? As a rule something over a generation may be held adequate. Morton's comedies, written towards the beginning of the century, were costume plays by the middle thereof; and plays extracted in the latter half of the century from the works of Dickens and Thackeray are now generally dressed according to the period to which they are supposed to belong. In some instances the period is prolonged. Bulwer's 'Money' was brought out so long ago as 1840. When now revived it is written in part up to date and is played in the costume of to-day. Not very important are the changes that have been made in the text. They are, however, significant, and not wholly congruous with the character of the proceedings depicted. In reviving 'Money' Mr. Hare, it was expected, would take us back to the high collars and nankeen pantaloons of our fathers. He has decided to do otherwise, and has sacrificed some measure of crainceblance. The play remains none the less effective, and is still capable of amusing and delighting an audience. With a thoroughness characteristic of his management, Mr. Hare has mounted the piece superbly, and has given it a cast such as it has not previously received. If the selection is not in every instance successful, the fault is not with the management, which secured the best talent available. In Mr. Forbes Robertson and Miss Kate Rorke Mr. Hare had to his hand the best hero and heroine to be obtained. Miss Rorke expresses from Clara Douglas the last drop of pathos and tenderness of which it is capable, and Mr. Robertson renders all but sympathetic that mass of vulgarity, sham cynicism, and affectation, Alfred Evelyn. Mr. Hare himself constitutes a perfect Sir John Vesey, showing to the life every aspect of this most ingenious and entertaining of tricksters. Miss Maude Millett's engagement for Georgina Vesey is excellent in all respects. Mr. Bouchier as Lord Glossmore and Mr. Kemble as Stout supply two excellent and well-contrasted performances, and Mr. Brookfield is a sufficiently Mephistophelian Dudley Smooth. Mr. Gilbert Hare, as the old member of the club, scarcely prevails over the racket around him; and Mr. Allan Aynesworth, though he wisely eschews the "haw-haw" manner in Sir Frederick, scarcely assigns colour enough to the part. Outside the story, in a sense, stand Lady Franklin and Mr. Graves. In the former character Mrs. Bancroft shows a mastery of art such as no English comedian possesses. Again and again the superb method prevails over the exaggeration which in her late assumptions Mrs. Bancroft has thought fit to adopt. With her she takes compulsorily Mr. Arthur Cecil, who is bound to play up to her. Mr. Cecil is in passages beyond praise; in other passages he approaches dangerously near caricature. The entire representation was received with marked favour, and the revival is a success.

'Marriage,' with which Mr. Brandon Thomas began his management of the Court Theatre, is not wholly new, having been seen a couple of years ago at an afternoon representation at the same house. It is an amusing piece of topsy-turvydom, which, if we abandon ourselves into the hands of the author, may be seen with pleasure and advantage. Wholly preposterous are the motives to action of the characters, but the characters themselves are delightful, the incidents are comic, and the dialogue is entertaining. As the whole is admirably acted it obtains a complete success.

Mr. Clement Scott's pathetic rendering of a portion of 'Jeanne qui pleure et Jeanne qui rit,' played in admirably effective style by Miss Vane Featherston and Miss Carlotta Addison, proved profoundly touching. It was originally seen at the St. James's, with Mrs. Kendal and Mrs. Gaston Murray in the principal characters.

Dramatic Gossip.

With reference to our notice of 'Plays and Dramatic Essays,' by Charles Lamb (Athen. No. 3472), its editor, Mr. Rudolf Dircks, writes to point out that we were mistaken in supposing that 'Munden's Farewell' and 'John Kemble and Godwin's Tragedy of "Antonio"' "are not included in the companion volume in the same series." We regret the oversight, although it in no way affected our remarks. We objected to Mr. Dircks's positive statement that, as early as 1799, Lamb had submitted the MS. of 'John Woodvil' to Coleridge. Mr. Dircks now pleads that Lamb probably did so—a surmise against which we have nothing to urge, except the lack of evidence.

On Wednesday evening Signora Duse resumed at Daly's Theatre her two great, if widely opposed, characters of Mirandolina in 'La Locandiera' and Santuzza in 'La Cavalleria Rusticana.' In both she vindicated her supremacy. Her picture of Goldoni's sparkling padroncina was exquisite in archness, espèglerie, and beauty; and her presentation of the Sicilian peasant had all its old intensity and truth. Both impersonations have received their full tribute; and the fact that the actress is an artist of highest mark in comedy and tragedy is now universally conceded. It is to be hoped that her future programme will comprise some of those characters in French comedy in which she is known to be unsurpassed, but which as yet are unseen by her English admirers. Her company, seen to little advantage in Dumas filz and Sardou, exhibited itself in a far better light in Goldoni and Verga. Signori Rossi and Romasina were quite excellent.

MR. FREDERICK W. BROUGHTON, whose death from pleurisy took place last week, was the author of many one-act plays, the best known of which are 'Withered Leaves,' 'Written in Sand,' and 'Ruth's Romance.' To the Criterion he gave, November 19th, 1887, 'The Circassian,' a three-act fantastic comedy, adapted from 'Le Voyage au Caucase' of MM. Emile Blavet and Fabrice Carré. 'A Peer of the Realm' obtained considerable success in Australia, but has not, so far as we know, been seen in this country. A Yorkshireman by birth, Mr. Broughton began life as a solicitor.

MR. CONYNS CARR will make no immediate change at the Comedy, at which house the representations of 'Frou-Frou' will be continued until the close of the season.

The performances at the Strand of 'Jaunty Jane Shore' finished on Saturday last. On Tuesday afternoon, for a benefit, a variety entertainment was given.

'La Frolique,' a new "ballet burlesque" in three tableaux, has been added to the bill at the Empire.

'AN ARISTOCRATIC ALLIANCE' will on the 30th inst. be replaced at the Criterion Theatre by Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy's 'The Candidate,' an adaptation of 'Le Député de Bombignac.'

NEW BOOKS.

LADIES in the FIELD. Edited by the Lady GREVILLE. Articles on Sport by the DUCHESS OF NEW-CASTLE, DIANE CHASSEREAU, Mrs. CHA WORTH MONTAGU, Miss ANSTREUTHER, Lady GREVILLE, Mrs. MARVELLI, Lady BOYNTON, Mrs. PENNELL, Miss LEALIE, Mrs. JENKINS, and Miss SALAMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"The several chapters are entrusted to skilful hands, and deal with sport as practised by ladies in a very sensible and instructive manner."

"It is not often one comes across such a tempting book. . . . We cannot too strongly recommend 'Ladies in the Field' to our readers, and think that it is a book to be on every sportsman's library table."

NOW READY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

'AN ENGLISHMAN IN PARIS.'

MY PARIS

NOTE-BOOK.

In 1 vol. demy 8vo. price 14s.

Contemporary France, with the never-failing interest of the period since 1855, is mirrored in the pages of this book with the intimate, and at the same time universal, knowledge only possible to a man of the world, whose acquaintance with human nature is aided by his skill in noting the salient features both of circumstances and of men.

THE ROMANCE OF AN EMPRESS.

CATHERINE II. of RUSSIA. From the French of E. WALISZEWSKI. A New Edition in one Volume. With Portrait. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"This book is based on the confessions of the Empress herself..... Few stories in history are more romantic than that of Catherine II. of Russia, with its mysterious incidents and thrilling episodes; few characters present more curious problems."—Times.

'Miss Stuart's Legacy,' 'From the Five Rivers,' &c.

In 3 vols.

SECOND EDITION.

A DAUGHTER OF MUSIC. By G.

GOLMORE, Author of 'A Conspiracy of Silence,' &c. In 3 vols.

"The people who 'yawn over a novel' would not yawn over 'A Daughter of Music.'... this story of passion and doom..... The catastrophe which involves the four actors lifts the novel into the realm of tragedy."—World.

NEW ONE-VOLUME NOVELS.

THE STORY OF A MODERN WOMAN.

By ELLA HEPWORTH DIXON.

Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 6s.

"Miss Ella Hepworth Dixon has inherited no small share of her father's literary gifts, and she adds to it a faculty of observation and a constructive and narrative skill which are of considerable promise. As to the story itself... Miss Dixon is to be commended for having given a delightful touch of novelty to her treatment of the subject."—Graphic.

PICTURE REPAIRATION or CLEANING executed with every regard to taste and cautious treatment, by M. KATHE YOUNG, artist, 25, Abchurch-lane, London, E.C.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE-ART GALLERY,

14, NEW OXFORD-STREET, LONDON.

is remarkable for the Display of Copies of Coloured Works of THE GREAT MASTERS.

ISRAEL in EGYPT. By R. J. Poynter, R.A.

Copies 6s. and 3s. each.

"We have from the Autotype Company a reproduction in their process of Mr. Poynter's 'Israel in Egypt'—due to a monochrome copy of the picture, about 6 ft. by 12 ft., on which the painter worked with his own hands in oil, preserving the character of the figures in a surprisingly happy and complete way. From this monochrome a reduced, but still large autotype copy has been published. In the absence of a line engraving we could not hope for a truer or more acceptable transcript of this intensely interesting picture, one of the most important examples of the English school."

Autotype, November 9, 1893.

THE ARTS of PEACE. THE ARTS of WAR.

By Sir F. Leighton, P.R.A.

TWO NEW NOVELS.

THE QUEEN OF LOVE.

By S. BARING-GOULD.

Crown 8vo. 3 vols.

"You cannot put it down until you have finished it."—Punch.

"The scenery is admirable, and the dramatic incidents are most striking."—Glasgow Herald.

"Strong, interesting, and clever."—Westminster Gazette.

THE QUEEN OF LOVE.

"The characters have the individuality which tamps Mr. Baring-Gould's works."—Speaker.

"Can be heartily recommended to all who care for cleanly, energetic, and interesting fiction."—St. James News.

THE QUEEN OF LOVE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'MEHALAH.'

"Within the bounds of the sufficiently familiar, he creates a tragedy fraught with the most powerful of passions and impulses. 'The Queen of Love' is certainly the best of the author's more recent novels."—Globe.

THE QUEEN OF LOVE.

"This story bears the stamp of the author's vigorous individuality. The book is full of excitement and good literary work, and the characters are boldly drawn."—Court Circular.

WINIFRED MOUNT.

By RICHARD PRYCE.

Crown 8vo. 2 vols.

"Mr. Richard Pryce is a deft and elegant storyteller, gifted with a lively imagination, a sprightly humour, and a keen insight into the intricacies of human character. He possesses, moreover, constructive ability of no mean order, and the plots of his refreshingly succinct romances, though slight in substance, are symmetrical in form. All these good qualities are agreeably exemplified in his new novel. An extremely clever story, utterly untainted by pessimism or vulgarity."—Daily Telegraph.

WINIFRED MOUNT.

By RICHARD PRYCE.

"We should like to tell the plot of Mr. Pryce's delightful story, if only to show how skilfully it is put together. This very clever book was put down with a sincere admiration of the writer's skill. The sketches of fashionable life are exceedingly well done, and the minor characters are so cleverly brought upon the canvas that they seem an integral part of the picture. The writing is uniformly bright and graceful."—St. James Daily News.

WINIFRED MOUNT.

"The novel contains clever sketches of character, scenery, and manners, and there are passages where Mr. Pryce gives us a wonderfully vivid impression by the emphasizing of some minor detail."—Scotsman.

JOHNSON'S GARDENERS' DICTIONARY. A New Edition, thoroughly Revised and considerably Enlarged. By C. H. WRIGHT, F.R.M.S., and D. DEWAR, Curator of the Glasgow Botanic Garden.

"We are glad to see the publishers of this valuable work again in the field with a new edition, thoroughly revised and considerably enlarged. It is without doubt one of the most reliable and important gardening dictionaries that has ever been published; in fact, as a dictionary and guide for gardeners, amateur or professional, its equal is not to be found in horticultural literature. It forms a marvellous digest of matters horticultural, and a standard work for the guidance of all interested in the art and science of gardening. It is beautifully printed, and the style in which it is turned out is highly creditable to the eminent publishers."—Horticultural Review.

Now ready, 3 vols. demy 8vo. 32s. New and Completely Revised Edition of

A DAUGHTER of TO-DAY. By Sara JEANNETTE DUNCAN. Author of 'A Social Departure'. 2 vols.

"A terrible satire on certain aspects of 'the revolting daughter.'"
"What she writes is always good reading... She has depicted a phase of the artistic temperament and of Bohemian life with such charm and vigour that it is unnecessary to ask whether they are true to life."
—Scotsman.

IN the FACE of the WORLD. By ALAN ST. AUBYN. Author of 'A Fellow of Trinity'. 2 vols.

"The author of 'The Junior Deas' comes back to his first form and surpasses himself in interest in his new novel... Alan St. Aubyn writes as a skilled and conscientious artist, who has not only a purpose to serve, but a story to tell, and who does both with success."
—World.

A SOLDIER of FORTUNE. By L. T. MEADE. Author of 'The Medicine Lady'. 3 vols.

"Phyllis is a really fascinating character."
"Frank simplicity of style and a thoroughly wholesome tone of sentiment are merits so uncommon in present-day fiction that we gladly note them as the distinctive features of 'A Soldier of Fortune'... A bright and readable novel."
—Speaker.

SAINT ANN'S. By W. E. NORRIS. Author of 'The Ragged Dicks'. 2 vols. Second Edition.

"It is quite out of the question that Mr. Norris should write a dull and clumsily constructed story, or one that does not abound in clever characterizations and lively dialogue... 'St. Ann's' is well worthy of attentive perusal... The book is not only amusingly written, but of unflagging interest throughout, and full of 'good things.'"
—Daily Telegraph.

The SAVOY OPERA and the SAVOYARDS. By PERRY FITZGERALD. With 30 Illustrations and Portraits. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 2s. 6d.

"It was a happy thought on the part of Mr. Fitzgerald to relate the history of 'The Savoy Opera' in this attractive volume."
—Daily News.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

MR. SADLER'S DAUGHTERS. By Hugh COLEMAN DAVENPORT. With a Preface by Stanley I. Wood
"As a light, amusing, somewhat farcical story, 'Mr Sadler's Daughters' has no little merit... The story is sufficiently entertaining, and will be relished by readers who want to be amused."
—Scotsman.

The RED SHIRTS: a Tale of the Terror. By PAUL GALLOT. Translated by J. A. J. THE VILLIERS. With 4 Frontispieces

The RED-HOUSE MYSTERY. By Mrs. HUNTERFORD. Author of 'Molly Hawk'.
"The book is workmanlike and readable throughout."
—Scotsman.

TOM SAWYER ABROAD. By Mark Twain. With 20 Illustrations by Ida Beard "Told with a humour that makes 'Tom Sawyer Abroad' one of the most amusing of Mark Twain's many laughable books."
—Fourth and Home.

The REBEL QUEEN. By Walter Besant.
"The Rebel Queen" is a remarkable work. It is fascinating as a fiction, and it is instructive and suggestive as a study in sociology to an extent which is not to be taken in at a first reading."
—World.

MONEY. By Emile Zola, Author of 'The Downfall' &c.
"No one will be able to read 'Money' without a deep sense of its 'colossal truth'... Everything in the novel is on a grand scale... A vast landscape of national vicissitudes."
—Morning Leader.

VASHTI and ESTHER: a Story of Society
"To-day, by 'Ukiah' of the World."
"Vashti and Esther" will give the captivate plenty to do, for it is a tale of types, if not of people. It is a clever book, written by one who knows, who will be read during, no doubt—ever again."
—Trinity Fair.

BLACKIE'S SCHOOL AND HOME LIBRARY.

Under this title the Publishers have arranged to issue a selection of the best and most interesting books in the English language.

The Library will include lives of heroes, ancient and modern, records of travel and adventure by sea and land, fiction of the highest class, historical romances, books of natural history, and tales of domestic life.

An important feature of the series will be the careful editing of the books, to render them in all respects fit to be read by young people. This editorial work will be carried out in such a way as to maintain the integrity of the books, only what is objectionable or superfluous being discarded.

"A beautiful production."—Liverpool Daily Post."Often have books been honoured in the past; but seldom, we think, with the majesty of margin, the beautiful type, and the luxurious adornment of this new periodical. We confidently predict for Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co.'s new periodical a brilliant three years' career."—Naturalist Review.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

SONGS WITHOUT NOTES. By LEWIS MORRIS, Author of 'The Epic of Hades,' &c. Fcap. 8vo. 2s.

"We cannot refuse to admire his healthy optimism, his glowing faith, and his attempts to idealize and draw a spiritual lesson from the more arid aspects of modern life."—Times."At a Country Wedding" is an agreeable example of the chastened expression of his lyric verse. It is a pretty epithalamium and decidedly unconventional. Charming, also, is 'The Voice of Spring,' with its refrain-like close."—Naturalist Review."Readers of the most varied tastes will each find in this book a pleasure of his own. It will be welcome to lovers of poetry wherever English is read."—Spectator.

LITERATURE

Astrophel, and other Poems. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus.)

ALTHOUGH the poem which gives this book its name is one of the most charming in the collection, it could scarcely be the most important in a volume containing such pieces as 'A Nympholept,' 'Grace Darling,' 'An Autumn Vision,' 'Loch Torridon,' 'On the South Coast,' 'England, an Ode,' and many others. 'Astrophel' simply records the feelings that came to the poet after reading Sir Philip Sidney's 'Arcadia' in the garden of an old English manor house, but it is full of noble sentiments nobly expressed. Although Mr. Swinburne has always been opposed to what are called irregular metres—metres governed by no recognized law—he has of late years been much addicted to the blending of metres according to a recognized metrical scheme. In this poem groups of stanzas written in the 'Dolores' metre alternate with groups of stanzas in the metre which the poet first used in 'The Armada'—a metre which was based on that of the old English prophecy about England and her destiny:—

They shall ride
Over ocean wide
With hempen bridle and horse of tree.

Undoubtedly the effect of such a blending as this is very fine, but it is only a skilled rhythmist who should attempt it.

But it is not merely in elaborate combinations of metrical movements that the poems in this volume show Mr. Swinburne's skill as a metricist. Often he will so transfigure an old familiar stanza as to make it unrecognizable. Let us, for instance, give here a stanza or two from 'The Palace of Pan,' written, we believe, as late as last September, in the same fascinating pine country where the 'Nympholept' was written:—

Ridged pillars that redden aloft and aloof,
With never a branch for a best,
Sustain the sublime indivisible roof,
To the storm and the sun in his majesty proof,
And awful as waters at rest.

Man's hand hath not measured the height of them;
May measure not, awe may not know

In its shadow the woofs of the woodland are wrought;
As a bird is the sun in the toils of them caught,
And the flakes of it scattered as snow.

As the shreds of a plume of gold on the ground
The sunflakes by multitudes lie,
Shed loose as the petals of roses dis-crowned
On the floors of the forest engilt and embrown'd
And reddened afar and anigh.

A temple whose transepts are measured by miles,
Whose chancel has morning for priest,
Whose floor-work the foot of no spoiler defiles,
Whose musical silence no music beguiles,
No festivals limit its feast.

We wonder how many readers of these stanzas have discovered that they are written in the metre of a poem whose very name calls up a smile, Monk Lewis's 'Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogene.' That it was undertaken as a tour de force is manifest, but in the hands of a master of metre how beautiful the measure becomes!

It is in the nature of things that a very considerable portion of this book should consist of memorial verses. Primarily it is vividness of emotion that makes men poets, and it is but natural that the link between poet and poet, when it exists, is often stronger than common. For the true kinship between men, being of nature's own weaving, is far deeper than any accidental tie of blood relationship, as we see notably in the case of Charles Lamb and Coleridge, where there was in the survivor no true recovery from the blow caused by the loss of a friend dearer than a brother. And, when the meridian of life is passed, the poet, like the rest of us, turning round and seeing behind him a "Street of Tombs," must needs wonder how he could have survived the loss of so many comrades who once seemed part and parcel of life itself. Very likely this is the reason why the memorial verses of a true poet are often among his most beautiful work. Death, who in our youth seemed so hateful a foe, wins us to him by the very ruthlessness of his warfare upon our affections. After the poet's middle age has passed, when many friends have vanished, a halo of poetry and romance seems to encircle Death's brow that takes away all its hideousness. In a word, the King of Terrors has gradually developed into a royal owner of half the beauty that once belonged to life, and it is through him, if at all, that the poet will find many a beloved companionship he has lost. No wonder then that all the memorial verses in this volume are alive with beauty. None of them, however, is so likely, we think, to strike home to the reader's heart as those on Philip Bourke Marston, the blind poet whose character, apart from his pathetic story, would alone have the power to keep his memory green among those who knew him.

Exquisite, if monotonous and sometimes rather diffuse, as is his poetry, Marston was as a man far greater than his work, and, besides, most lovable, as Nature seemed determined to make manifest; for in a face whose extraordinary poetical beauty seemed to be increased by what can only be called the light of his blindness, there was expressed that nobility and high enthusiasm without which no one can hope to write true poetry. We say the light of his blindness, for his face had a strange and marvellous luminosity, such as the brightest eyes could never have lent it. As an instance among many that could be cited of his personal attraction may be mentioned the fact that it drew around him a group of young writers who called themselves "The Marston Club," a club which since his death has expanded under another name into one of the most interesting literary and artistic gatherings in London. Such being his character, it will be seen that the following lovely verses are in no way an exaggerated expression of the charm he exercised over those who knew him:—

Thy song may soothe full many a soul hereafter,
As tears, if tears will come, dissolve despair;
As here but late, with smile more bright than laughter,
Thy sweet strange yearning eyes would seem to bear
Witness that joy might cleave the clouds of care.

And yet love yearns again to win thee hither;
Blind love, and loveless, and unworthy thee:
Here where I watch the hours of darkness wither,
Here where mine eyes were glad and sad to see
Thine that could see not mine, though turned on me.

Another memorial poem inspired by a deep personal affection for a great and noble soul is that upon Count Saffi, the heroic friend of Mazzini, and one of the triumvirs of Rome in 1849. As a triumvir Saffi was great, and when Italy's hopes were destroyed and he passed into private life he did not, because he could not, become greater, but he retained undimmed every quality, grand as well as sweet, that made him great when in power. And if it is true that in mere style the Italian gentleman is above all others, Saffi seemed to transcend even the type to which he belonged. Such a man deserved a worthy memorial, and he has found it in this noble poem.

Another unbroken intimacy of more than twenty years is immortalized in the two poems upon the late Sir Richard Burton. The enthusiasm expressed in these verses does not appear in any way to exaggerate the poet's admiration of the traveller:—

A wider soul than the world was wide,
Whose praise made love of him one with pride,
What part has death or has time in him,
Who rode life's lists as a god might ride?
While England sees not her old praise dim,
While still her stars through the world's night swim,

A fame outshining her Raleigh's fame,
A light that lightens her loud sea's rim,
Shall shine and sound as her sons proclaim
The pride that kindles at Burton's name.
And joy shall exalt their pride to be
The same in birth if in soul the same.

Besides these funeral wreaths of affection laid upon the tombs of intimate friends there are in the volume memorial verses upon the two illustrious English poets whom we have lately lost. The threnody on Tennyson could not fail to be impressive, both in feeling and expression. It suffers somewhat, however, from the fact that the metre is the same as that adopted in the birthday ode on Tennyson, the same which we have described in speaking of 'Astrophel.' In every poem metre and subject should be so entirely in harmony as to be inseparable, and it is difficult to think that any measure which fully conveys the high spirits of a birthday ode can convey the solemnity and the sorrow of a threnody.

But this is especially so in regard to the brilliant list of the metre in question.

Of the almost miraculous powers of Browning Mr. Swinburne has always shown the deepest admiration, and Browning, on his side, used to say that the famous passage on the subtlety of his poetry in Mr. Swinburne's essay on George Chapman afforded him more delight than all the eulogies of his work to which in his later years he became accustomed. Worthy of both writer and subject is the sonnet sequence upon Browning's death. No one could possibly write adequately of Browning who had not a knowledge of the man, because without such a knowledge no one could realize how inscrutable are the ways of Nature in moulding personalities, how completely she can bring into harmonious working subtlety of intellect with a simplicity of character of the most winsome kind. Browning, indeed, was a living refutation of the common, but most egregious mistake of associating single-mindedness with dulness of the intellectual faculties, and subtlety of intellect with subtlety of character. Hence it is no exaggeration to say that among the many privileges of having been brought into contact with Browning was that it acted as a new education in the study of mankind. Between him and the writer of these sonnets there was this kinship—that in them has been seen the concentrated electricity of life at its tensest—and it is no wonder that they appreciated each other.

Fine as is this sonnet sequence, however, we cannot say that the peculiarity of the rhyme arrangement adopted in the sestet strikes us as being happy. Mr. Swinburne has always been fond of beginning the sestet of a sonnet with a couplet after the French fashion, and undoubtedly very fine effects of rhythm may be secured by adopting this method. Yet the French form of sonnet runs a risk of becoming too epigrammatic, especially where a strong pause occurs at the end of the third line. And this is more noticeable in English than in French sonnets on account of the immense strength of the English decasyllabic line as compared with the broken-backed alexandrine which the French poet is compelled to use. But in Mr. Swinburne's sonnets on Browning the sestet both begins and ends with a couplet. The metrical idea of the sonnet seems, therefore, to be lost altogether. Yet we may well guess that in Mr. Swinburne's hands such a metrical arrangement expresses a new metrical motive of some kind.

In the two sonnets upon the monument of Giordano Bruno, however, Mr. Swinburne shows himself to be—but that was not necessary—a true master of the sonnet form. He is never stronger than in invective. The embarrassment of poetical wealth from which he suffers does not seem to stand in the way of direct work when the moving energy is anger. Artistically speaking, one of the finest sonnets he ever wrote—and, indeed, one of the finest ever written—is that most indignant one upon the proposed interment of the Prince Imperial in Westminster Abbey. But even this is surpassed in vigour by the second of the twin sonnets upon Giordano Bruno. Here, as in the sonnet above mentioned, he shows that quality of masterful concentration which is not usually associated with his name. Whatever may be said of its purely poetical qualities, line for line this sonnet, from the artistic point of view, consists of the strongest fourteen lines in the volume, the most close in texture, showing, indeed, a masculine grip of subject and method worthy of Villon himself. Upon Mr. Swinburne's general lack of the Villonesque concentration in rhymed measures a great deal has been said, yet as far as we know the subject has not been adequately touched upon by any of his critics. We have often thought, indeed, that one of the great needs of our time is a good common-sense treatise upon the laws of cause and effect in poetic art in relation to the methods of the new romanticism—a treatise going more into technical detail than does Mr. Clarence Stedman's admirable work—a treatise such as could easily be given by any one out of several critics whom we could name, such, for instance, as Mr. Traill, Mr. Gosse, or Prof. Dowden. Among the younger writers of our time a great deal of poetic power and impulse is exercised with a certain waste, which is inevitable where the great eternal principles of poetic art are too lightly considered. In art it is unlearning that is so difficult, as Keats showed until the last two years of his life, when he realized that if romantic poetry can delight us by that rich exuberance of suggestive diction which at first seemed to him to be the final efflorescence of the romantic temper, it can also delight us by a simplicity of utterance like that of some of the great Greek poets and like that of Wordsworth in certain great sonnets of his and in the 'Ode to Duty.' And the early sonnet on Chapman's 'Homer' shows that it was only the art of unlearning Keats needed in order to enable him as a mere boy to discover and adopt the "large utterance of the early gods," which even the romantic poet may discover and adopt.

It may be remembered that when contrasting Coleridge's method of work with Wordsworth's we came to the conclusion that "no two poets ever did work alike"; but it is when we contrast Wordsworth's style, and the methods by which that style is reached, with the methods and style of that class of poets to which Mr. Swinburne must be relegated, with both Shelley and Keats, that we see how infinite in variety is the form of expression of every faculty and endowment of man. After dividing poets into the born rhymers and those to whom rhyme is not a spur but a curb, there remains a still further division which separates the poets who exercise a rigorous selection of rhymes from those who do not. The moment a poet has chosen a word for the end of a line, all the feasible rhymes in the language leap into his brain like sparks from a rocket. Some poets by instinct take the first spark that rises, and use its suggestions; others by instinct wait and select. In reading any poet it is perfectly easy to see to which class he belongs. The various forms through which passed some of Wordsworth's sonnets, such, for instance, as 'Toussaint l'Ouverture,' and "The world is too much with us," prove that the poet, having made first a rigorous selection of the line-ending word, and then again a rigorous selection of the answering rhyme-word, filled up the line with unripe material, which became afterwards poetized by the mellowing sun of his genius. Keats's work, like Mr. Swinburne's, shows the very opposite of this method—it shows that simultaneously with the rhyme selection comes a line of ripe and almost perfectly poetized material. With each poet the method adopted is, as we have hinted, a matter of temperament, not of volition, and both methods have their advantages—both their disadvantages. A poet like Keats, with the entire poetic diction of our literature at his fingers' ends, and an enormous poetical diction of his own invention to boot, has no need to subject his lines to the poetizing process of Wordsworth, for as regards poetic material he finds every rhyme-word as luminous of tail as a comet, as is only too clearly seen in 'Endymion.' But then, for this very reason, he has no time to consider economy, and it is obvious that without a great deal of rhyme selection the peripeteia of the poem must needs be reached but slowly. For not merely every drama, but every poetical work from the epic to the sonnet or roundel, has its peripeteia, which has to be reached in the most economical way according to the methods of the form of art adopted—though many poets forget this. It is, of course, in the nature of things that poems in which there has been a too rigorous selection of rhymes sometimes seem to lack inspiration, while poems in which there has been a too hurried selection of rhymes sometimes lack that concentration which characterizes the work of many of the greatest masters. It is the fortunate fact that the sonnet-form demands a rigorous rhyme selection (whether the poet will or not), which explains the marvellous fact of the existence of so perfect a piece of work as the sonnet on Chapman's Homer in Keats's first volume, in which, owing to an entire absence of rhyme selection, there is otherwise little merit. But suppose that before he sat down to write 'Endymion' Keats had had the advantage of reading a treatise upon poetry such as exist in Greek and in French—suppose that he had been assured by such a treatise that in a rhyme-prosody a rigid rhyme selection is one of the first requisites—what an 'Endymion' he might have given us then! In the end he did learn all this, no doubt, for the strength and masculine grip of 'Lamia' are very largely the result of rigorous rhyme selection. And as for the great odes—the most perfect work, from the artist's point of view, that has been produced in this century—they could never have existed at all without it.

There are in this volume, however, poems full of fine frenzy—a fine frenzy unknown to any modern poetry since that of Shelley and that of Coleridge in one or two pieces, such as the ode to France—which would certainly have suffered by any attempt at compression on the part of the poet. The 'Nympholept' is a case in point—the most original poem both in motive and in treatment that Mr. Swinburne has yet given us.

As a perfect piece of artistic work, 'On the South Coast' must, perhaps, be set at the head of all the poems in this volume; that is to say, it does exactly what it sets out to do—give lyrical rendering of the beauty of Nature—with the least waste of material, considering the kind of form adopted. But, of course, such superb poems as 'An Autumn Vision' and 'Grace Darling' must in other respects be set above it, as must the Birthday Ode to Tennyson and 'England: an Ode.' Most readers, however, will turn first to the end of the book, for here is to be found the dedication to Mr. William Morris. It is in the famous 'Dolores' stanza, and is very beautiful, showing once again the poet's amazing mastery over double rhymes in anapestic measures. Perhaps, however, his very mastery over double-rhyme measures causes him to forget that the use of them in pathetic or impassioned poetry is not free from a certain kind of peril. Sometimes the skilled metrist is apt to forget his audience too much—apt to forget that poetic effects are a third something between poetic art and the molian harp of the human mind upon which poetic art has to blow. Now undoubtedly in the French language—the most unlucky of all the European tongues as a poetic medium—it may be true that the reader's "sense of difficulty overcome" is a true source of pleasure, even in poetry of the most impassioned kind. But this is not so in English poetry, where, except in the lightest kinds of verse, the sense of difficulty overcome is fatal to the reader's pleasure, whether the poet has overcome difficulties or not. Now the reader of English poetry—even he who has given the least attention to technique—is aware that in the English language double rhymes are as few as in Italian they are abundant, and consequently in reading impassioned poetry in double rhymes he is in constant danger of having his sympathy and even his imaginative belief disturbed by a sense of difficulty overcome.

It is not that the born rhymist who has had long practice in the rhymist's art does really find any difficulty in writing in double rhymes. The associative and suggestive power inherent in words is so infinite in its ramifications that the born rhymist's embarrassment is entirely that of riches, in double rhymes no less than in single. But in impassioned poetry the poet has to avoid the mere appearance of difficulty overcome. Unless he succeeds in doing this the reader is apt to refuse his full sympathy because he is not fully convinced of the poet's sincerity. If, however, the poet does succeed in quelling this sense of difficulty overcome, his triumph is far greater than that of him who works in single rhymes. And few writers of the seventeenth century were more fascinated by the music of double rhymes than was Shakespeare, judging from his sonnets. Indeed, over all English poets save those whose misfortune it was to be born between the Restoration and the new romantic revival, the ravishing music of double rhymes, especially in words full of liquids, has exercised an irresistible fascination—though the greatest masters of its use have, no doubt, been the poets of the nineteenth century.

Coleridge had a great love of double rhymes. Some of the most exquisite effects in 'Kubla Khan,' in 'France: an Ode,' in 'Christabel,' in 'The Ancient Mariner,' and in 'Youth and Age,' are the result of the skill with which the poet passes from single to double rhymes and back again. Coleridge, however, was too much influenced by eighteenth century models to throw himself upon the music of double rhymes with the abandon that we see in Shelley's glorious lyrics, especially 'The Skylark.' Keats passes freely enough into double rhymes, but always with an entire misconception of their meaning in rhythmic art. Instead of using them for the expression of an accession of emotion, as Coleridge and Shelley do, he used them as Leigh Hunt did, and as Browning afterwards did, to express mere jauntiness. Hence, although 'Endymion' begins (in its revised form) with a double rhyme, it is in such playful and, to say the truth, jejune work as the epistles to his brother, to Cowden Clarke and Reynolds, that he chiefly disports in double rhymes. Tennyson, though he, of course, understood the functions of double rhymes, and could use them with skill, had no great love of them, and they form no part of his best work; while Rossetti, whose ear, though good, was never equal to his other marvellous poetical qualities, indulges in them less than any other poet of the Victorian period. And this is remarkable, seeing how steeped he was in Italian poetry. Browning's use of double rhymes is really Hudibrastic. Not only did he not seek to hide the effect of difficulty overcome in poetry, but he made it a subject of positive display in his most serious work. He liked attention to be drawn to that ingenuity in poetic art which it is the first object of most poets to conceal. Of all masters of double rhyme, however, Mr. Swinburne stands first. It has yielded him more splendid musical effects than any other poet, but from the causes mentioned above it may at times have rendered his appeal to the human heart less effective than if he had used simpler measures.

Among the Moors: Sketches of Oriental Life.

By G. Montbard. (Sampson Low & Co.)

GEORGES MONTBARD is the nom de crayon of a French artist whose sketches of Morocco have long been familiar in the pages of one of the English illustrated papers. Some years ago he visited the northern part of Muley of Hasan's dominions in the company of Sir William Ingram and Mr. Walter Harris. Their route led from Tangier along the coast to Arzila and El-Araish, and then inland to Mequinez and Fes, the party visiting on their return journey El-K'sar el-Kebir (the Alcazar of Dom Sebastian's expedition), and Wazzan, the city of the Grand Sheriff, but no longer inaccessible to the least important of travellers. They also examined the ruins of Volubilis, but without adding anything to our knowledge of the Roman city out of which much of the two northern capitals, as well as Zarrhun, was built. This town, which M. Montbard calls "Mouley Idris," is still closed against Jew or Christian, and though seen at a distance, a visit to it was not attempted by the party whose proceedings are described in this volume. Indeed, with the exception of Jackson, who claims to have entered the place in 1801, though he does not describe it, it is not known for certain that any unbeliever has been more successful in profaning the spot which contains the sanctuary of the founder of the Idrissite dynasty.

But as Nazarenes now reside in Fes Morocco city—or Marakesh—and in Alonzar, it is scarcely likely, since Wazzan has lost most of its former sanctity, that the fanatics of this white hill-town will be able much longer to terrify the prying tourist from entering its gates.

It will, therefore, be seen that M. Montbard and his friends visited a most interesting part of Morocco. All of this region is dotted with the remnants of Roman occupation. Every crumbling Moorish city has a picturesque history which carries us back to the days when Christian fought with paynim for the possession of this portion of Northern Africa, and the wild Arab hordes rushed at each other in those civil wars which at times have almost depopulated Morocco. Yet of this we detect little consciousness in M. Montbard's pages. He is, indeed, not always unmindful of the famous fields over which he is passing, though he is evidently more concerned in the small-beer adventures which he chronicles with much liveliness and wit than in the ample opportunities for archaeological and scientific research which daily presented themselves. As for his companions, he complains that they were interested in little except sport. One of them practised photography, though, as a flock of sheep was his favourite object, geography gained little and art still less from manipulation over which, as a legitimate artist, M. Montbard waxes wrath. Towns they cared little for, unless when there was a bazaar, and the only merit in this was the low price at which, after long haggling, they could carry away some rubbish. Otherwise the party saw everything that their predecessors saw, and their successors will continue to see. They encamped where their military escort directed, shot rod-legged partridges, and received civility, or the contrary, from the Kaids on whom they called. The villagers brought them the "muna," or free gift of provisions to travellers with "the Sultan's letter," and no doubt, in the intervals of compliments, cursed most heartily the Christian dogs who fed at their expense. Nobody seems to have troubled them, though we infer, from the endless persiflages which M. Montbard bestows upon a gasconading member of the party, materials for amazing tales might be extracted out of the records of even their eventless journey. It is only fair to say that the artist writes well, often eloquently, indeed, and—except when abusing, as he does in a supremely silly preface of thirteen pages, the entire Semitic race—generally with good taste and accuracy. But as Mr. Harris described the same trip in his 'Land of an African Sultan,' published five years ago, the latest book on Morocco contains little new, unless, indeed, the reader is to accept as novelties the repeated personalities regarding the author's fellow travellers.

In this, as in most respects, the book is very French. The author's publisher is referred to as his "editor"; what in Morocco is known as "powder play" is described as "fantasia"; and the local governors are called "pashas," a Turkish title entirely strange to the country, every official being a "Kaid" with various qualifications. "Wad" (river) receives the French form of "Oued," while Wazzan is printed "Ouezzan," though to compensate Tangier is at least once called "Tangiers," a very English orthography which is usually accepted as a proof of the person so designating it never having been in the "City preserved of the Lord." It is, however, as an artist's impressions of Morocco that M. Montbard's volume must be criticized. And from that point of view it is admirable. On almost every page there is an excellent drawing, the entire series rendering this quarto not only the most lavishly illustrated book on "Moghreb-al-Aksa," but also the best of its kind. Scarcely one of the sketches is a failure, while some of them, more particularly those in outline, are most spirited rescripts of the daily scenes which pass before the traveller's eyes in that forlorn part of Africa. We see the silent villages basking on the plain, the "dsar" perched high up on the precipice, the "douar" surrounded by flocks and herds, the untamed Berber mountaineers watching the caravan entering the glen, the long strings of camels defiling through the pass, and the train of donkeys laden with fowls and eggs trotting patiently to market. Here are the pompous Kaid enveloped in the gauzy folds of his jellaba and the sinewy courier bounding along on his ceaseless errand. Or we have views of the noisy market-place; the narrow lanes in which we can almost smell the many odours and trudge through the filth of ages, or retire from the street (where the women turn their veiled faces to the wall as we pass, and the naked derwish blasphemers us both loud and deep) into the "fondak," where the merchants, it may be from Tafilet or Timbuctoo, sit smoking "kif" among their outlandish wares. All is graphic—all true to life, the only fault being a tendency, as in pp. 141, 151, &c., to the melodramatic, a vice which is even more frequently betrayed in the florid style of M. Montbard's narrative.

Blunders in matter of fact seldom disfigure the descriptions. Here and there, however, they occur. For instance, the open space in front of the sea gate of Tangier is not the "marine," but the "Marina." Cape Spartel was the "Ampelusius," not the "Ampelusium," of the ancients; and Tisetot has shown that the so-called "Caves of Hercules"—which are strikingly portrayed—were not the "aspecus Herculi sacer" of Pomponius Mela. Arzila or Azila was the "Zilia," not the "Zelia," of the Carthaginians; and it was not the "Constantia Zelis of the Romans," but "Colonia Zilis," which Augustus changed to "Julia Constantia," though it seemed to have lost the rank of a colony, since it appears without this qualification in the description of Ptolemy and the itineraries of Antoninus. Again, M. Montbard is in error when he says that Arzila was "destroyed by the English." This story, which is related by Leo Africanus, was doubtless based on the raids of the Northmen as far south as Barbary, though the statements of the geographer are not in keeping with the chronicles of El Bekri. Moreover, if Arzila has 1,500 inhabitants, instead of decaying, it must be increasing in importance; for a few years ago it had only five hundred. Nor could M. Montbard have taken "coffee with the English consul, a cunning son of Israel"; for an "English consul," Jew or Gentile, does not reside in that place.

These and a few similar errors, however, detract little from the value and nothing from the beauty of M. Montbard's book, which may be pronounced the best illustrated and not the worst written of the many volumes on Northern Morocco.

Criticisms on Contemporary Thought and Thinkers, selected from the Spectator. By Richard Holt Hutton. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

IN his dedication of these essays to the memory of a relative Mr. Hutton states that but for his request and valuable help in selecting them they would probably have been left in the temporary form for which they were alone intended. Mr. Hutton thereby gets to the windward of the most obvious, and at the same time the most just criticism that can be made upon his volumes, which consist of some seventy or eighty short articles, written mostly within the last twenty years, on a variety of religious, philosophical, and literary questions. Their range is certainly of the widest: it extends from the work and influence of a Carlyle or an Emerson to the elegant trifling of the late Lord Houghton, whom, as we are reminded, Carlyle once described as "a pretty little Robin Redbreast of a man"; from the life and achievements of a Darwin to the vague theological speculation of "Robert Elsmere"; from Dean Church on Bacon and the Psalms to Sir John Lubbock on ants and wasps. Articles which please and instruct when they are read separately, in that easy frame of mind in which we take up a weekly review, are apt to produce a very different effect when they are gathered together without any serious attempt at order, and presented en bloc as an estimate of contemporary thought and thinkers. So capable and experienced a man of letters as Mr. Hutton must be fully aware of the disadvantages which, from a literary point of view, attend an olla podrida of this description. The subjects of which he treats are far too numerous and far too miscellaneous to make up anything which in the strict sense of the word can be called a book.

Nevertheless, those who regularly attend to Mr. Hutton's expositions of enlightened orthodoxy, or his sociological or literary judgments, will be pleased to have some of the more important of his hebdomadal disquisitions in a handy form; and it is certainly interesting to see his canons of criticism applied on an extensive scale. The merits and demerits of his philosophical tenets, his religious theories, and his literary preferences are, of course, brought out in a much more positive and effective fashion than is possible when they are studied in snippets once a week. As a critic, Mr. Hutton has very wide sympathies and an ample endowment of the best culture; he is fully alive to the meaning and tendency of most of the intellectual movements of the day; and while some of his utterances are ambiguous or obscure, he generally thinks, and lets the reader see that he thinks, with great confidence. Nor does this confidence, on the whole, prevent him from being fair to his opponents; although now and then it leads him to ignore very patent difficulties, or unduly to praise those whom he regards as intellectual allies. For instance, in an article on Mr. Leslie Stephen and "the Scepticism of Believers," he takes Mr. Stephen to task for stating the platitude that just as a sceptic is a doubter as to the religious creeds which he rejects, so the believer is a doubter as to the sceptical creeds which he in his turn rejects. He ignores a difficulty which Mr. Stephen there indicated, and still more emphatically pressed in a later article entitled "Cardinal Newman's Scepticism," where he showed that when faith is invoked to explain what reason fails to explain, the process is a tacit admission that the human faculties are inadequate; in other words, that knowledge is impossible. Of the inordinate commendation given to an intellectual ally the essay on Canon Scott Holland's sermons may serve as a specimen.

The reader who is weary of theological controversy will find a pleasanter and perhaps more profitable employment in the perusal of the purely literary essays. Mr. Hutton is seen at his best in articles like those on "Sir Walter Scott in Adversity," on "Wordsworth the Man," and "Mr. Ruskin on Wordsworth." His culture, his refinement, and with certain reservations, chiefly due to extravagant admiration, his good sense, are in these literary articles especially conspicuous. As Mr. Hutton obviously has a very great respect for Matthew Arnold's literary judgment, it will not be uncomplimentary to say that in some respects his critical endeavours, his way of approaching a subject, and the air and manner with which he handles it, recall at times Arnold's method. His commendation of Arnold's prose style is in this connexion highly significant, for he takes the opportunity of making a remarkable statement which, if it serves no other purpose, illustrates his conception of a good literary style. He declares that in his opinion Arnold "almost rendered Milton's poetic style into prose—prose far better than Milton's prose, which was turgid and violent—prose which is at once stately and lucid, sonorous and simple, graceful and vigorous." This is surely an erroneous comparison, a most unjustifiable belittling of Milton, and most extravagant laudation of Arnold. Mr. Hutton's own style, in a measure and at times, deserves some of these fine epithets, but it is at other times very far from meriting them. He shares to the full Arnold's terrible trick of iteration; his sentences are frequently of an exasperating length and of the most ungainly character; he gives the reader the impression that his thoughts are running away with his pen and that he is ignorant of the virtues of revision. These are great faults; but it must in justice be said that Mr. Hutton is most unequal, and that he often writes with unimpeachable lucidity and elegance.

NEW NOVELS.

The Power of the Past. By Esmé Stuart. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

AN English girl with Spanish blood in her veins shoots a lover on the eve of her marriage with the man she loves. But it is a question whether she shot him or not; there was a struggle, and his hand was on the revolver; but, at any rate, she took the weapon, for self-defence, out of the drawer where it had lain, and it went off. Next morning she marries the other man; and very soon after the honeymoon she brings herself to the point of making full confession to her husband. This is the groundwork of Eamè Stuart's plot, which she unfolds with much ingenuity, and develops in its later phases with considerable interest and depth of feeling. The theme is a strong one, if not quite so fresh and natural as that of the same writer's 'Woman of Forty,' and the workmanship is on a sufficiently high level throughout.

Red Cap and Blue Jacket. By George Dunn. 3 vols. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THE plot of 'Red Cap and Blue Jacket' originates on a coral island in the South Pacific, where two men, Ralph and Nicholas, whose names were in the British peerage, were the sole survivors of a shipwreck. The young lord and his collateral are wearily waiting for a vessel to take them off their living tomb; the vessel arrives, but only one of the two escapes in her. We follow his fortunes in England. He is Lord Wimpole, a darkly mysterious man, with a thousand inconsistencies in his character and actions, and many good points striving for predominance with the bad. A good deal, as the reader will perceive, remains to be explained, and Mr. Dunn may be left to do it in his own way. His way is a little stiff and stilted, a little too much stiffened out with tags of Latin and Greek and French; but still the explanation is duly given, and the interest of the story is not to be denied. The Lord Wimpole who figures most in the story—for, of course, there are two Lord Wimpoles—is not very far from being a fine creation.

For Love and Liberty. By Alfred Harcourt. 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

MR. HARCOURT tells a story of Spaniards and Englishmen, set in the framework of the disastrous voyage of the Armada, and with the dark deeds of the Inquisition for its background. Raymond d'Aguilar, the hero, ends by renouncing allegiance to King Philip, and settling down with his wife in Cornwall as a loyal subject of Queen Elizabeth. This is to some extent an educational book in a highly educational cover, so that the reader gets a little history and geography out of it, as well as a strain of wholesome romance. It is not quite so exciting and engrossing as some historical novels, but it may minister pleasantly enough to the patriotic pride of the author's fellow countrymen.

Sarah: a Survival. By Sydney Christian. 2 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

THERE is a delicate irony involved in the title of Mr. Sydney Christian's novel, which will be fully appreciated by most readers of his engaging story. Sarah, we fear, is a type of English girlhood that is in danger of becoming as extinct as the dodo (with a small d), and it is well that she should have met with such skillful and loving portraiture as that which is accorded her at the hands of Mr. Christian. The patriarchal mode of life of an old English country house has seldom been more pleasantly drawn, and the mutual attachment of Sarah and her uncle, Dan Thornborough, a most delightful personage, forms the key-note—none the less welcome for being unconventional—of the entire story. The length of time over which the action extends—some twenty years—is not conducive to dramatic unity or effectiveness of plot; but the development of the heroine's character is traced with skill as well as sympathy. It is, in short, a wholesome as well as a graceful book, full of charming and whimsical touches, and written with a decided distinction of style.

A Daughter of To-day. By Mrs. Everard Cotes (S. J. Duncan). 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

THE bright and sparkling books by which Miss Duncan made her reputation may quite possibly prejudice some of her admirers when they find Mrs. Cotes offering them a serious piece of work in a serious mood and demanding their best attention. Moreover, the searching study she has made of a particular type of advanced young woman can hardly appeal to so large a public as did her delightful 'American Girl' or 'Mem-sahib,' for the reason that the thing portrayed with such elaborate realism is familiar to a comparatively small class of people. Elfrida Bell's artistic perceptions are those of a sensitive plant, her moral ones are entirely subordinated to them. She has drunk in "modernity" on a soil alien to its development, and made her way from Illinois to the Latin Quarter in Paris and Lucien's studios, as one coming to her own home from a far country, instead of leaving it behind. Her failure as a painter, her keen appreciation of the atmosphere she has chosen, her intense self-consciousness and conviction of her powers in some walk of art, if not in that of painting, her moral callousness, and a host of other characteristics subtly indicated make up an unusually powerful character sketch, drawn with an almost cruel grasp of its flimsiness and its deficiencies. Elfrida's experiences in Paris and London, the friends who compose her circle, the man to whom she gave whatever heart she had, and who cared nothing for the gift, are all touched with those vivid strokes which other stories by this writer have made familiar. But Elfrida remains herself the central figure, the most absorbing of all the characters in the book. Her creator touches her with an almost malignant hand, illuminating her egotism, her affectation, her heartlessness, the ill-breeding of her gospel of art and life, in letters of flame. She is cleverly contrasted with another girl of greater intellectual power, a truer artist, and also a truer woman. Janet Cardiff is a charming outline (hardly more) of a bright, generous nature and a gentlewoman. The book is well worth the attention it demands, and if the conviction at last slowly dawns upon the reader that it contains a purpose, it is one which has been produced by the inevitable law of reaction, and is so cleverly manipulated as almost to justify the existence of one in a work of fiction. Some of the French requires careful attention in subsequent editions. The printer is probably responsible for some errors, but there are Anglicisms, and genders as well as terminations at fault.

The Rich Miss Riddell. By Dorothea Gerard. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THOUGH by no means on the same plane as 'Orthodox' or 'Recha,' Miss Gerard's new novel is much more than merely readable. The difficulties of a high-minded heiress, endowed with a sensitive and warm heart, form the theme of her new venture, and they are treated with perfect sympathy, considerable subtlety, and an entire absence of sensationalism. Miss Riddell's protégée, a pretty Viennese governess, is admirably drawn, and there is comedy as well as pathos in the cross-purposes in which they are involved by their fidelity to different ideals of life. It is needless to say that the pictures of foreign life are informed by that thorough knowledge and insight familiar to Miss Gerard's readers, while, although in the main of a serious complexion, the story is illumined by one or two humorous episodes, amongst which special mention may be made of the disastrous results of the heroine's impulsive almsgiving to the Viennese beggars. The scene in the hospital and Miss Riddell's splendid mendacity bring a neutral-tinted romance to an effective and even dramatic climax.

A Puritan Pagan. By Julien Gordon. (Gay & Bird.)

THERE is something very familiar about this book—not that the story, so far as it goes, is particularly wanting in originality, but the characters have a family resemblance to those in countless other American novels turned out by the same firm of publishers. There are the passionate heroine, who must have been excessively disagreeable to live with; the calm, self-possessed lady who manages everybody; and that terrible hero, who is sufficiently described in the following sentence: "'I perfectly agree with you,' said he, devouring a fine Bartlett pear, and in so doing showing his splendid white teeth under his dark auburn-brown moustache." However, there are some good things in the book: the French society seems lifelike, and its faults and merits are not unduly exaggerated; and Singleton Ackley's course of instruction to Paula in the gentle art of a wife revenging herself on a husband is quite well done. However, these points are only palliatives in this specimen of a particularly dreary class of novels.

The Story of Dan. By M. E. Francis. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

MRS. FRANCIS has written another thoroughly good book, in quite a different style from her successful volume of sketches, 'In a North-Country Village.' 'The Story of Dan' forms one story of a more ambitious character than any of those pleasant studies of oddities and quaint personalities, and the scene is now changed from England to Ireland. The tragedy of Dan's love and death, terrible from its circumstances, is rendered doubly so by its evident inevitableness. What has been told before of Dan makes it impossible for him to tell the awful secret of his rival's death, and so it is obvious that nothing can save him, as he alone of the two witnesses had the intelligence to know the murderer. Excellent, too, for dramatic probability is that wild outburst of hatred against him in court from the girl he loved, an added touch which heightens the pathos of his end. And all through the description of the man's shy and hesitating, but ineradicable love is done with the utmost delicacy of invention. Either, too, is a coquette well conceived and well executed, and not least in her love for the idiot brother, which throws into relief the designing and unamiable side of her nature. Admirers of Mrs. Francis's former book hardly need to be told that the conversations between Mrs. Green and Mrs. Drennan, and the description of village festivities, are amusing and vigorous. The only scene to which we should demur is the dinner-party at Mr. Cassidy's, in which the satire on genteel people seems neither particularly novel nor devoid of exaggeration. Perhaps not quite so charming as 'In a North-Country Village,' this book shows an increase rather than an abatement of power.

Time and the Player. By Lewis Hainault. "Independent Novel Series." (Fisher Unwin.)

"THE PLAYER" is a rather disagreeable man, with nervous, long-fingered hands, who behaves like a bear to the female members of his family; but he had some cause to be disagreeable, because his speculations on the Stock Exchange were somewhat of a failure, and early in the book he is threatened with apoplexy or madness—which it is the author omits to mention. There is a certain misplaced talent in the book; the man's restlessness and his wife's childishness are cleverly, if somewhat wearisomely described; but the whole thing seems an altogether unnecessary fuss about some rather dull and vulgar people, who seem to be always eating exquisite dinners, and looking at one another from the "tawny crowns of their heads to the last dusky folds of their sombre velvet trains" (the epithets are varied to suit the occasion). The story seems to show the work of a young hand, who regards his handiwork with quite unnecessary solemnity and affectation. If he would not think quite so much of his stock-brokers and their poses, and would dwell less on the beauty of a Wardour Street drawing-room, he might do less annoying work than this.

The Silver Bullet. By P. Hay Hunter. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

MR. HUNTER's story is brightly written, and its interest is not sacrificed for want of material; in fact, the annoying part about it is that it is overburdened with situations suggestive of excitement, which, presumably for want of space, have to be inadequately treated. Thus a whole novel might almost be worked up from the material afforded by the composition of the crew alone, a crew that would have satisfied Capt. Marryat in his most sinister moods, whereas here the mutiny turns out to be a very sorry affair, barely occupying a chapter.

Then, again, that very silver bullet, which gives its name to the book, somehow fails utterly to come up to the expectations aroused on its first appearance. Such failures to grasp the situation seem to suggest a wicked waste; still there is enough fully developed interest in the book to make it pleasant for a railway journey.

The Temple of Death. By Edmund Mitchell. (Hutchinson & Co.)

MR. MITCHELL's story of adventure, sensational though it be, contains nothing that is absolutely impossible—indeed, the so-called narrative might well be founded on fact, as the few who know best the India of the natives will be the first to admit. The author has shown both sympathy with the natives, and an appreciation of the artistic value of contrast; for while relating the exploits of a villainous sect of fanatics, he brings out in high relief the virtues, courage, and fidelity of certain of their countrymen. The story is of such a nature that to attempt a sketch of the plot would be difficult, and also unjust to the reader. The details are realistically worked out, and the local colouring is exact. There is likewise enough of love-making to render the book interesting to the sentimental. In short, this is an attractive bit of sensational fiction.

Deferred Pay; or, a Major's Dilemma. By Lieut.-Col. W. H. McCausland. (Digby, Long & Co.)

WHAT "deferred pay" has to do with this novel we fail to see, but the "major's dilemma" is of the most stupid and impossible nature. As a gossiping bit of military fiction the tale is readable enough, and the account of a newly joined sub at the old "Pongo" dépôt at Chatham is by no means destitute of humour or truth. As a whole this book is a string of wild absurdities. Col. McCausland may be a distinguished officer, but, if so, he does not illustrate the saying that the pen is mightier than the sword.

The New Arcadia: an Australian Story. By Horace Tucker. (Sonnenschein & Co.)

CO-OPERATION is excellent when it is applicable; Socialism wishes to make it compulsory and universal. The hero of this story endeavoured to combine what was best in both, and met with more success than generally attends on such philanthropic plans. It is easy on paper to form such; in practice it is difficult to work them out to a successful issue. In this instance we have an interesting, well-narrated story of an ideal settlement. There is sufficient plot in it to interest the reader, knowledge of the good and bad sides of human nature is exhibited, and a state of things is described such as never has existed in Australia or in any other country.

Our Alma. By Henry Goldsmith. (Sonnenschein & Co.)

READERS, we fancy, will derive too extravagant an idea of Australian scenery and of the foliage from this volume. In other respects it forms a plain, unsensational, life-like description of the lives of a superior class of gold-diggers and market-gardeners.

It differs from other Australian stories through the fact that the events could not have occurred in any other country; in short, it is characteristic, and carries internal evidence that it was written on the spot by a colonist. But it will interest women more than men.

TEXT-BOOKS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

THE second volume of Mr. H. Craik's anthology of English Prose (Macmillan & Co.) covers the period between the end of the sixteenth century and the Restoration. It contains 600 pages, the size of the book being largely due to the space allotted to minor authors. There is always a great difficulty in observing anything like proportion in collections of extracts such as this; but, making all allowances for the individual tastes of the editor and his fellow workers, we fear it is impossible to approve of the way in which this part of the work has been done. Hayward should surely not have been permitted as much room as Hobbes; Clarendon's prose has no right to twice the area allotted to Milton. Where to Leighton are allotted ten pages, to Heylyn eight, and to May something over seven, the speculative reader may well hazard a guess as to how many will be left free for Cowley. We are not skilled in working problems of this sort, but we fancy most persons who have any acquaintance with the achievements and history of English prose will admit that the answer ought to be more than four. The biographical and critical introductions vary greatly in value, but among those which are not strikingly good we have discovered none that is not passable. The most elaborate (and probably the best) of the essays is Dr. Ward's account of Milton's prose in connexion with its historical surroundings. The same writer is also to be credited with scholarly notices of Jonson and Cowley. Mr. Saintsbury takes charge of Burton, Hobbes, Donne, and Fuller, and does his duty ably. Mr. Gosse writes agreeably about Walton. The late Prof. Minto's notice of Bacon is a good little bit of criticism, which one wishes longer. Mr. J. H. Overton's introduction to the specimens from Jeremy Taylor seems to us the least satisfactory of the essays attached to the more important writers. He has apparently failed to appreciate Taylor's rank and qualities as a stylist, and such little literary criticism as he ventures on is perfunctory and inadequate. Among the minor introductions, Mr. Ker's Herbert of Cherbury and Mr. Wallace's Chillingworth claim favourable notice. Mr. E. K. Chambers is very well-meaning, but his extravagance needs chastening and his affectations subduing to fit him for work of this kind. The book is an interesting one to dip into, but we fear it will prove more valuable to the candidate for examination than to any worthier class of student.

IN spite of the attention that has been bestowed of late years on the study of Old English, the ideal manual for the novice is yet to be written. It may be questioned, indeed, whether he has the chance of using so helpful a book as a former generation had in Vernon's 'Anglo-Saxon Guide.' Prof. Earle's little 'Book for the Beginner' is sensible and practical, but somewhat out of date; Dr. Sweet's work suffers from his lack of experience as a teacher; and Mr. Albert Cook's First Book in Old English (Boston, U.S., Ginn), which is now before us, strikes us as unnecessarily crabbed and difficult, and unduly overloaded with phonologic detail. Mr. Cook's workmanlike translation of Sievers needs no fresh praise, but Sievers's arrangement and method are not at all suited to the needs of the beginner; Mr. Cook appears to have suffered from the memory of them, although he has tried to avoid so doing. The beginner wants tables of the "parts" of strong verbs to commit to memory; it is not at all the same thing for him to be told that "any strong verb having eu in the first preterite stem" belongs to a certain class—especially as the statement is misleading. The beginner will make nothing of the schedule that tells him that "original a" corresponds with "derivative α, ε, ο, α, ιε," and his interest in the explanation and phenomenon of u-umlaut will probably be slight. Moreover, extreme condensation adds much to the difficulty of a "first book" in any subject, and Mr. Cook is unwise in devoting space he can ill spare to certain interesting but inappropriate appendices. The brief remarks on syntax are helpful, and the selection of texts is good, though we would gladly see the thirty pages of verse banished to make room for more prose. We notice a commendable (but, we fear, not very successful) attempt to expound briefly the scheme of O.E. metre. The glossary appears to have been compiled with great care, and we have no doubt many competent teachers will find the book a useful one to adopt in their classes.

CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS.

MR. T. H. HALLWARD'S Idylls of Theocritus translated into English Verse (Longmans & Co.) comes at a good time. Summer is the season for reading Theocritus—summer, "when even the very lizard on the wall is sleeping, and the larks no longer fare afield"; when, like Theocritus's own shepherds, one can lie in the shade and listen to the whisperings of the pine trees and the murmurings of wandering bees. Therefore any tolerable version of the Idylls deserves the critic's gratitude for having sent him back to one of the sweetest of Greek poets; and Mr. Hallward's version, if not perfect, is more than tolerable. To test it one turns naturally to the seventh idyll, the 'Thalysia,' and finds this happy rendering of a passage which, as much as any, shows the kinship between Theocritus and the modern love of nature:—

Over us masses of poplar and elm waved; sacred water Babbling and murmuring gushed from a grot of the nymphs hard by us.

Sunburnt merry cicadas aloft on the shadowy branches
Piled their ceaseless song, and afar in the bushes of bramble Gaily the tree-frogs chirped, and the crested larks and the snobes

Sang, and the turtle moaned, and over a plashing water
Darted golden bees; all things smelt richly of summer.
Richly of autumn; pears and apples in bountiful plenty Rolled at our feet and sides, and down to the earth all round us

Glow-berries bent their trailing boughs thick-laden with berries.

This is good and sympathetic translation, though the metre is not so smooth as in the original, and we should have preferred "harvest" to "autumn" as the rendering of ἀύρη. Autumn is, with us, too much the season of decay, and of "mists" even more than of "mellow fruitfulness." This may be taken as a fair specimen of Mr. Hallward's work. The translation is faithful, the workmanship fair and sometimes good. The hexameters, which are his prevailing metre, halt at times, chiefly from a tendency to use two monosyllables in the final spondee. The use of different metres in different poems, although the originals are all in hexameters, is, we think, justifiable; for the Greek hexameter occupied a wider field than any one modern metre, and its different moods may rightly be represented by different rhythms. An example of Mr. Hallward's blank verse may be taken from the description of the carved cup in the first idyll:—

An aged fisher, too, thereon is wrought,
That standing on a rough rock drags his net
With eager toil to make another throw.
Bravely he labours; every limb seems set
On fishing, and each sinew on his neck
Swells, for the old man's strength is like a youth's.
Anigh that wave-worn shore a vineyard bows
Beneath its comely load of ruddy grapes;
A little lad sits on a dry-stone wall
On guard; two foxes round him roam.

The last line is defective, without apparent reason—an oversight akin to that which, on p. 89, has left a single line without a partner amid a series of heroic couplets. But positive defects are not numerous. Calverley's version no doubt bars the way to some extent; but those who try Mr. Hallward will find him a pleasant guide to the knowledge of a delightful poet, and (it is due to the publishers to add) presented in a well-printed and tasteful volume.

MR. E. P. COLERIDGE has already won his spurs as a translator by his versions of Euripides and Apollonius Rhodius. In his new venture—Sophocles, translated into English Prose from the Text of Jebb (Bell & Sons)—his task has been made both easier and more difficult by the existence of the edition from which the translation is made. It is hard for Mr. Coleridge to have to put himself into comparison with Prof. Jebb's tasteful and excellent version; it is difficult to be independent without being consciously inferior. On the other hand, it is tolerably certain that a careful workman, with Prof. Jebb's edition before him, cannot go far wrong in the interpretation of the original. Mr. Coleridge's work is careful, and he is not slavish in his adherence to Jebb; he has exercised his own judgment with discretion. Hence his translation may be trusted as sound and faithful; and where there are marked differences among editors as to readings or interpretations, the conflicting views are wisely recorded in the notes. Sophocles hardly admits of being rendered at once idiomatically and faithfully into English prose, and Mr. Coleridge is occasionally a little wooden and conventional. Here and there, also, he lapses into blank verse—a fault very difficult to avoid; e.g. on p. 98 ('Ed. Col., 607'), "To gods alone comes never age nor death; all else the mighty master, Time, confounds. Earth's strength decays; decays the body's might; faith dies, and faithlessness is born." The reader who has little Greek may find some obscurity in such a sentence as: "But now the day, when reckoned up to date, misgives me as to how he fares." But, as a rule, the workmanship is good, and to the student of Sophocles who needs the assistance of an English version in order to arrive at his author's meaning, and to whom Prof. Jebb's monumental edition is inaccessible, Mr. Coleridge's translation may be confidently recommended.

LAW BOOKS.

Cases and Opinions on International Law, with Notes and a Syllabus. By FROEMAN SNOW, LL.B. (Boston, U.S., Boston Book Co.)—This treatise on the principles of international law is compiled on a plan which, so far as we know, has not heretofore been applied in this country to this branch of law. The main part of the work, which is preceded by a list of contents, a "Syllabus," and an introductory chapter, is divided into two parts. Part I. deals with "International Relations in Time of Peace," and comprises chapters on "States-Territorial Rights," "Territorial Jurisdiction," "Jurisdiction on the High Seas," and "Nationality." Part II. deals with "International Relations as modified by War," and comprises chapters on "Measures short of War," "Effects of War as between Enemies," and "Relations between Belligerents and Neutrals." The principles dealt with are expounded by reported cases selected from English or American law reports, or by opinions given on actual cases by English or American law officers or jurists. To each case is prefixed a very brief head-note showing the point dealt with in the case. The latter, of course, is not set out in extenso, but so much only of the judgment is given as is necessary to explain the principle involved. A work of this sort is undoubtedly calculated to give to the student clearer and more vivid ideas of the subject than he would be likely to get from ordinary text-books. The work, however, is merely intended to supplement, not to supersede, text-books and lectures, for, as the author observes in his preface, "a collection of cases and opinions.....must necessarily leave many gaps." There are a good many foot-notes explanatory of the text; and an appendix comprises, among other things, an account of the Behring Sea Arbitration of last year, the text of the Declaration of Paris, 1856, and the text of the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Sick and Wounded of Armies in the Field. The "Syllabus," a special feature of the work, sets forth nearly two hundred principles or points of international law, with the names of works—British, American, and foreign—where information may be found thereon, and will be found of much use not only by the student, but by every one interested in the subject.

Messrs. MACMILLAN & Co. publish The Law and Jurisprudence of England and America, a series of lectures delivered at Yale by Dr. DILLON, a retired American judge, whose knowledge is considerable, but whose style is bad. The work gives a long account of "our law in its old home," i.e., of the origins of English law, of the Inns of Court, &c.; but it does not profess to be original, consisting mainly of quotation, and we do not ourselves find it interesting. An account of the work of Blackstone and of that of Bentham, who are taken as the types respectively of Tory lawyer and of Radical law reformer, is more readable. In conclusion the author predicts the attainment of international uniformity in copyright, mercantile, and marine law, and the assimilation of all laws of real property to those governing personality. There is one good story in the book, which traces the origin of modern liberal legislation concerning married women's property to a Mississippi statute of 1839, which was based on the law of the Chickasaw tribe of Red Indians by a member of the Mississippi State Legislature, who, harassed by creditors, was about to marry a rich widow. Dr. Dillon gives us a high opinion of himself as a man by a pretty passage about Bentham's letter to his love (the lady who had rejected him) written in his eightieth year. Dr. Dillon's belief that all the British "colonies and settlements" have the "laws of England" is an error. We administer not only brand-new codes of our creation, which differ widely from what he calls the laws of England, but also the Code Napoléon, the Roman-Dutch law, the law of the Koran, &c. There are far more than "41,000,000" Mohammedans in India.

MR. THEODORE DODD publishes a larger edition of his earlier handbook, through Mr. Horace Cox, under the title of The "Parish Councils" Act. Of all the handbooks to the Act it may be safely said that they are not much more simple than the Act itself, and that on the really difficult points they do not afford additional information or help. It, no doubt, was extraordinarily difficult to do so, and highly dangerous; but still the fact is as we state, and we cannot profess to think that any one of them will save anybody much trouble. For example, taking Mr. Dodd's work (and he is deservedly a very high authority on the questions involved), if the reader searches for guidance on the most difficult points which are arising from day to day, he finds that the index is not accurate, the pagination of the index being often wrong; that the position of women (which is confusing the assistant overseers) is not so clearly stated as it is in the Act itself; and that as regards the registration of electors, which is driving all assistant overseers mad, nothing is added to the directions of the Local Government Board's circular, which is in conflict with the county circulars which have been issued to overseers by some clerks of the peace. With regard to women the difficulty has been caused by the fact that Mr. Fowler argued in the House in favour of the enfranchisement of the married woman owner, and of women owners not also occupiers. Mr. Fowler also received votes of thanks for having enfranchised these two classes, but the Act has not done so. Mr. Dodd quotes the clause, does not precisely explain this point either the one way or the other, and then says: "Remaining Disqualifications of Women in Local Government.—She [sic].....cannot vote in local affairs when she would be qualified to do so if a man, by being on the Parliamentary register as a 'lodger' or 'servant.'" The omission of the word "owner" in this sentence is either a bad mistake or most misleading.

MR. RICHARDS (the author of works which we have previously reviewed on elections and corrupt practices), Mr. Payne, and Mr. Soper publish through Messrs. Jordan & Sons The Parish Councillor's Guide, a small handbook which is intended to be very clear, but which does not appear to be any clearer than the Act, although it may be admitted that the Act is far from plain. For example, a man wants to know the first thing that most people do want to know about it: who is eligible to the Parish Council of his village? It is easier to find the answer in the Act than it is in the work before us, where, indeed, a full answer is not distinctly given at all, as it is in one place in the Act. We come to the statement "First meeting" (i.e. of Parish Council): "by.....the Act the first elections are to be held on the 8th November, 1894, or such later date as the Local Government Board may fix." (Not exactly! The later date must be in 1894 as the law stands, whereas the new register is not in force till 1895, a contradiction which needs legislation to clear it up.) "In municipal boroughs the new register is ready at the end of October" (not a register to be used for parochial elections). No one would understand from the paragraph the real state of things, which is that legislation is needed either to postpone the elections until 1895, or to bring into force in 1894 a register on which they can take place. The municipal register has little to do with the matter, as the only registers needed are the Parliamentary registers, with the addition of County Council electors who are not Parliamentary, and of some other women. The work before us goes wrong about the married women, and says, "All disqualifications on married women are removed, and women, married or single, may be registered as electors on the Local Government..... register." No one would imagine from this that the disqualification of married women owners continues; and the statement that women previously disqualified are added by the Act to the Local Government register, i.e. the register of County Council electors, is untrue. They are only added to the parochial register, and then only occupiers who, but for the disqualification, would have been County Council electors.

MR. HARRIS STONE and Mr. Pease publish, through Messrs. George Philip & Son, Local Government Act, 1894: a Practical Ready Reference Guide to Parish Councils and Parish Meetings, Alphabetically Arranged. We see some advantage in this little work and have not detected in it any actual errors.

We have now had the opportunity of praising three excellent handbooks to the Local Government Act of 1894. We regret that we cannot also praise one with the title The Annotated Acts, 1894: No. 1, Parish and District Councils, The Local Government Act, 1894, by Mr. Lely and Mr. Craies, published by Messrs. Sweet & Maxwell and by Messrs. Stevens & Sons. We were first alarmed by the statement, "Doubts appear to have arisen as to the register on which the elections are to take place." The register could not but be the register of parochial electors in force for the time being. The elections are directed to be held at dates to be after November 8th. A public promise was given that the first parochial register should be brought into being by legislation on November 1st. When it was found necessary, doubtless after this book had been printed, to alter the date of the registers to November 22nd, the date of the election was in consequence put off. There never was, nor could be, any real doubt as to the register. We next come to a curious statement as to the "fusion effected between the poor law and the sanitary authorities.....in rural districts." The existing extent of fusion is not increased, but is slightly diminished by the Act. A third statement, which caused us to close the book, as it seemed useless to read further, is: "Parish Council.—Any parochial elector of either sex who has resided for twelve months in the parish or within three miles of it may be elected." This is strictly true; but never was truth stated in more misleading fashion, for any person, not a parochial elector, of either sex, who, &c., may also be elected. Such a guide can only conduct the reader to the ditch.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. publish a prettily printed little volume under the title Thames Rights and Thames Wrongs, by Mr. C. H. Cook. The volume, which deals with all the matters which are the subject of proposed legislation at the suggestion of the Conservancy, is useful for a few weeks, but will be out of date when the Bill of the present year has passed. We hope that Mr. Cook will give us a fresh volume on the present position, or a larger book on the whole question. He is thoroughly competent, for he knows all about the matter, and his sympathies are on the right side, that is, in favour of public rights and the preservation of natural beauty.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

The Life and Duties of the Citizen (First Course): a Handbook for Teachers. By J. Edward Parrott, B.A., LL.B. (Allen & Co.).—This little work seems to have been suggested by the important minute of the Education Department known as the Evening Continuation School Code of last year. Part of that Code relates to education in the life and duties of a citizen. Mr. Parrott's aim has been to make his work "a scheme for the adoption of managers and teachers" in their efforts to give effect to the Code so far as it relates to the subject in question. In addition to an introductory chapter, and chapters on "Patriotism" and "The Nation and the State," the work contains chapters on representative government, including local government, districts large and small, and the work and powers of the various "Boards"; on central government, including an account of the position and powers of the Crown and the Houses of Parliament, and of the working of the parliamentary system; on executive government; and a chapter on the duties of citizens in relation to local and central government. A cheerful and stimulating tone pervades the work, which will tend to make it attractive to pupils as well as to teachers. A short extract, which we take from pp. 11 and 12, will illustrate generally the style of the book:—

"In a modern State, no good citizen can truthfully sing, like the Miller of the Dee, 'I care for nobody, No! not I, and nobody cares for me.' We are all 'members one of another,' and so much are we bound up with each other, that every one who neglects his work, or does it badly, is thereby injuring the State. Every action we do has its influence, great or small, on the State as a whole. We can easily understand how an unjust judge might injure many people directly by his action and example, and spread distrust and alarm through the whole land; we can also see how the 'Liberator' frauds, beside ruining many thrifty men and women, give rise to suspicion against all undertakings of the same kind, and so discourage thrift. But it may not be so easy to see how humble workers may do mischief to the State as well."

The author then proceeds to give instances of disastrous consequences flowing from carelessness or dishonesty in apparently trifling matters. The work may be read with profit by many persons, old as well as young, outside the ranks of those for whom it is primarily intended.

MESSRS. SAMPHSON LOW & Co. publish Federal Britain, a not very practical work, by Mr. de Labilliere.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have been well advised to include in the "Golden Treasury Series" a volume of Selections from the Poems of Arthur Hugh Clough. The same publishers send us reprints of two of Mrs. Oliphant's novels, The Wizard's Son and a better-known story, A Son of the Soil.—Messrs. Smith & Elder have reissued in one volume Mr. Merriman's story From One Generation to Another.

MISS HETHERINGTON deserves much credit for the care she has bestowed on indexing the chief articles that appeared in the most popular British and American magazines during 1893; but it is a misnomer to call her volume an Index to the Periodical Literature of the World ('Review of Reviews' Office) when the periodicals of the continent of Europe are excluded.

At the present time M. Weill's account of Saint-Simon et son Œuvre (Paris, Perrin & Co.) will be read with interest. It is a painstaking sketch of a most remarkable man, not so well known as he deserves to be in this country.

In the twentieth volume of the Dryburgh edition of the "Waverley Novels" Messrs. Black have included, along with The Talisman, The Two Doctors, My Aunt Margaret's Mirror, The Tapestry Chamber, and The Death of the Laird's Jock. Mr. Hindley's illustrations to 'The Talisman' possess considerable merit.

WE HAVE ON our table Sir Samuel Baker, by A. E. Lomax (S.S.U.).—Darwin, his Work and Influence, by E. A. Parkyn (Methuen).—Twelve Years' Residence on the West Coast of Scotland, by Capt. James Mason (Gurney & Jackson).—About Perak, by F. A. Swettenham (Singapore, 'Straits Times' Press).—Oxford and her Colleges, by G. Smith (Macmillan).—A New Elementary Latin Grammar, by H. Belcher, Part I. (Hachette).—Principles of English Composition through Analysis and Synthesis, by P. Goyen (Macmillan).—English Writers: an Attempt towards a History of English Literature, by H. Morley: Vol. X. Shakespeare and his Time (Cassell).—A Manual of French Commercial Correspondence, by S. E. Bally (Methuen).—Optical Experiments, by Dr. H. Zwick (Neumann).—The Venetian Painters of the Renaissance, by B. Berenson (Putnam).—Bibliography of the Sialian Languages, by J. C. Pilling (Washington, Government Printing Office).—The Economics of Commerce, by H. de B. Gibbins (Methuen).—Secularism, its Progress and its Morals, by J. M. Bonham (Putnam).—Tales and Sketches of Modern Greece, by N. W. Williams (Nutt).—A Princess of Paris, by A. C. Guntor (Routledge).—Anecdotes from the Comet (Simpkin).—The Aukward Squads, and other Stories, by S. F. Bullock (Cassell).—Pilate's Wife, by R. T. Hayward (Burns & Oates).—A Stock Exchange Romance, by B. Hemming (Digby & Long).—Beyond the Ice, by G. R. Murphy (Low).—The Kestrel's Nest, and other Verses, by A. Cochrane (Longmans).—Poems, by J. P. Everett (The Author, 61, Grosvenor Road, S.W.).—The Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix, translated by the late Rev. J. M. Neale, D.D. (Eyre & Spottiswoode).—Village Sermons, by the late R. W. Church, D.C.L., Second Series (Macmillan).—The Ten Commandments, Sermons, by R. Eyton (Kegan Paul). Among New Editions we have New Studies in Temesmy, including a Commentary on 'Maud', by M. Luce (Baker).—and Chambers's Elocution, selected by R. O. H. Morison (Chambers).

MADAME RENAN.

May 24, 1894.

THE comments which have appeared in the public prints on the death of my dear friend Madame Renan appear to me so wholly inadequate that I venture to trouble you with these words. In one, not unkindly notice, I read, in reference to the question of religious convictions, that Renan "good-humouredly forbade the gentle Madame Renan ever to try and convert him," a statement which conveys a wholly false impression not only of the relations between the two, but of the lofty and beautiful character of the wife. Those whom she honoured by her intimate confidence and friendship—and I am proud to claim for myself, and more especially for my husband, a place in that number—were most deeply impressed by her keen wit, her strength, her fearlessness, coupled, as these were, with a sympathetic tenderness of nature which prevented her from any faults of insight. She so completely understood the nature and point of view of him to whom she consecrated her life, that she voluntarily kept her own convictions hidden from sight, lest they should in any way seem even to disturb the full harmony of her husband's work—realizing, as it seems to me that every true woman must, the wisdom as well as the beauty of such a course. From what she was to her husband, the world may judge what she was to her friends. One, who was among the chief, writes to me to-day, "I am very, very sorry for us, and for me, not for the dear lady herself—for she loved old Renan so that she could not be herself one moment when he was gone. But you know how I cared for her." How she cared for her husband—to the completion of whose work she had devoted her whole energies; nay, sacrificed her life from the day of his death—will be seen from the letter which she wrote me shortly after, and which, as a tribute to her own memory, I now wish to make public:—

12 Oct., 1892.

CHÈRE LADY DILKE.—Je vous suis profondément reconnaissant de la sympathie que Sir Charles et vous me témoignez si affectueusement. Les grandes douleurs n'ont pas de consolation; mais le souvenir des chers amis est le seul adoucissement qu'elles puissent recevoir. Merci donc d'avoir senti combien je suis à plaindre, combien ma vie est brisée, et de m'avoir assurée que votre précieuse amitié m'était fidèle. Le prix dont se paient les jours heureux est d'autant plus grand que le bonheur a été plus complet, et vous savez combien était étroit et absolu le lien qui m'unissait à mon bien-aimé mari. Je ne puis vous en dire davantage aujourd'hui. Je ne puis que vous prier de croire tous deux à ma sincère affection.

CORNÉLIE RENAN.

Her life thenceforth was buried in the past. She toiled upstairs to see us whenever we were in Paris, and we knew that, in truth, her life was broken. A trembling woman, whose eyes were full of ready tears—a creature absolutely changed from her old courageous, valiant, and brilliant self—she must now remain in our recollection. Last December my husband found her behind a rampart of books and MSS. in her rooms at the Collège de France, and "Je mène une vie d'homme," she said, explaining how she worked from morning to night, never pausing except to take food, that she might finish her appointed task.

EMILIA F. S. DILKE.

ANNE CLIFFORD'S CONTESTED LETTER.

IN an article on letter-writing published in the World, April 5th, 1753, Sir Horace Walpole quotes the famous and often-repeated letter by Anne Clifford, Dowager Countess of Pembroke, Dorset, and Montgomery, to the Secretary of State (supposed to be Sir Joseph Williamson), who had been over-urging her on behalf of his candidate for the borough of Appleby:—

"I have been neglected by a court, I have been bullied by a usurper, but I will not be dictated to by a subject. Your man aban't stand."

—ANNE DORSET, PEMBROKE, and MONTGOMERY.

Lodge and other writers who repeat it doubt its genuineness. The author of her memoir in the 'Dictionary of National Biography' gives as reasons for doubting it that Sir Joseph Williamson was not appointed Secretary of State until 1674; that Anne died in 1675, and that there was no election at the time; that the style was quite unlike that of Anne's other letters; and that she always signed her titles, not in the order of her marriages, but in that of their creation. Neither that writer, however, nor any of the other critics seems to have followed the correspondence in the Domestic Series of State Papers at the Public Record Office, which, though it does not include the contested letter, illustrates it in a remarkable manner. The Parliament elected in 1661 has been called the Long or Pensionary Parliament, lasting till 1678. (See Parl. Papers, vol. lxii. part i. p. 590.) John Lowther, Esq., of Hackthorp, and John Dalston, Esq., of Accornbank, were burgesses for Appleby. John Lowther's death necessitated a new election, and in January, 1667/8, there was great excitement in and about Appleby. From Anne's position as High Sheriff of the county she had the right to nominate a candidate, and on account of her great goodness and bounty to the town the burgesses always elected the man she nominated. She determined to have one of her grandsons the Tuftons, sons of her daughter the Countess of Thanet. Four of them were over twenty-one, and all in need of occupation. Failing them she meant to select her kinsman Anthony Lowther. But Joseph Williamson, then secretary to Lord Arlington, Secretary of State, had set his heart on the seat, and by fair means or foul was determined to secure it. He was a native of those parts, and had friends and relatives there, who all bestirred themselves in his favour. Everybody "plied the Countess,"—Joseph Williamson, his brother and friends, the neighbouring gentry, the Justices of the Peace, the Bishop of Winchester, and even Lord Arlington himself. Her replies at first were very polite, but they soon became "definite."

Anne's first letter, explaining how her interest was engaged, January 16th, 1667/8, was addressed to "Mr. Secretary Williamson at Whitehall," proving that there is no weight to be attached to the argument based on the date of Williamson's appointment in 1674. To Lord Arlington on January 17th she writes: "Mr. Williamson, being of so eminent an ingenuity, cannot miss a Burgess-ship elsewhere." On January 25th Arlington writes again on behalf of his secretary. On January 29th George Williamson writes to his brother: "Unless the three Tuftons are taken off by Lady Thanet's means it is impossible for any man to oppose. Dr. Smith fears the taking off of the old lady, but if done, we shall be joyful." February 4th, Dan Fleming urges Williamson to "ply the Lady Pembroke. If you cannot accomplish this, you should stay the writ as long as you can, until you have a good account of your interest in Appleby."

The same day Dr. Smith tells Williamson that his friends work. "The success of it will be seen by her answer to Lord Arlington, whereof she showed me a copy. I cannot see how it is possible to do any good unless her grandchildren be taken off." Same date, George Williamson's letter to his brother shows that Lord Arlington had been urging Thomas Tufton to withdraw. "Neither Arlington nor the Bishop make any impression on the wilful Countess."

Lord Arlington writes again, to which Anne replies on February 6th: "It was myself, and neither my daughter of Thanet nor any of my children, that made me attempt making one of her sons a Burgess for Appleby. If it should happen otherwise, I will submit with patience, but never yield my consent. I know very well how powerful a man a Secretary of State is throughout the King's dominions, so am confident that, by your Lordship's favour and recommendation, you might quickly help this Mr. Williamson to a Burgess-ship without doing wrong or discourtesy to a widow that wants but two years of fourscore, and to her grandchildren, whose father and mother suffered as much in their worldly fortunes for the King as most of his subjects did." This letter shows that the contested epistle cannot have been written to Williamson, but to Arlington about Williamson. It may, of course, have been re-addressed to him, and may have been found among his papers. One can see that the spirited old lady had been kindled to white heat, and very little more was necessary to make her write something very like what has been attributed to her. As to the criticism of her style. She employed a secretary, Mr. Sedgwick, who was absent from the Castle for twelve days about this date. It is just possible that Thomas Tufton, the young candidate himself, became her secretary for the occasion, and transmitted his grandmother's sentiments as he thought she expressed them, without affecting Sedgwick's clerical polish. The error in her titles may have arisen accidentally in transcribing for the press. On February 9th George Williamson writes to his brother enclosing a letter from Dr. Smith:—

"If the town be left to their own freedom your brother will carry it, but I doubt that the Countess will never let it come to that, being resolved to present one to them. If none of her grandchildren will accept, she will pitch upon Anthony Lowther. She has been heard to say that if they all refuse, she will stand for it herself, by which you may imagine what the issue is likely to be."

February 13th.—Sir John Lowther to Williamson says that in compliance with his wish he had taken off his kinsman from the candidature: "I believe that her Ladyship will prevail in her resolution with regard to her relations.....and will neither desire, seek, nor need anybody's help to make whom she desires. I know this by a letter from the Mayor."

February 23rd.—Thomas Gabetis, Under-Sheriff of Westmoreland, to Williamson, says that he studied to serve him, but that the Countess had planned otherwise, "the Corporation being disposed to gratify her for her great nobleness and bounty to the place. My station obligates me to render service with obedience to her commands, especially in this particular." At this date, just when we might have looked for Walpole's letter, the correspondence ceases. Between the editor and the printers it seems to have disappeared. But the other letters are corroboratory of its authenticity, rather than the reverse.

In her diary, Harl. MS. 6177, we find no notice of the canvassing, but we find her own notes on the election, 1687/8:—

"And on ye second day of March in this year my grandchild, Mr. Thomas Tufton, was chosen Burgess of ye Town of Appleby, to serve in ye House of Commons in Parliament therein assembled and sitting in Parliament at Westminster in ye place of Mr. John Lowther, my cousin's son, who dyed: so as Mr. Thomas Tufton, my grandchild, began first of all to sitt in ye said House of Commons at Westminster as a member thereof the 10th day of March, he being ye first grandchild of mine yt ever sate in ye House of Commons."

From the same diary we see that this Mr. Thomas Tufton visited his grandmother and his constituents on September 21st, 1668, in 1670, and in 1674. And the parliamentary returns show that he sat till the close of the Parliament in 1678.

So the Lady Anne had her own way, in spite of the Secretary of State, as she had had, through her spirit and determination, with King and with Protector before, living up to her motto, "Preserve your loyalty, defend your rights." CHARLOTTE CARMICHAEL STOPES.

MR. BRIAN HOUGHTON HODGSON.

A VETERAN diplomatist, explorer, and man of science passed away, as the Athenæum mentioned last week, in the person of Mr. Brian Houghton Hodgson, who died in London on the 23rd ult. from the effects of a chill. Born as long ago as February, 1800, near Macclesfield, Mr. Hodgson entered the service of the East India Company in 1818. He was successively secretary to the Resident and Resident in Nepal from 1820 to 1843, when he retired from the service, residing, however, some fifteen years more in India, at Darjiling. His political services may be passed over here, with the observation that his elaborate investigations as to the value of the Nepalese (Gorkha) troops, then almost unknown, and in regard to vernacular education for India, contributed largely to shape our Indian policy in two important matters.

In literature and science his services were great, both as a writer and a collector. His contributions to the journals of learned and other societies, notably the Asiatic Society of Bengal, numbered about 170 articles. Their chief topics were, besides the military and educational subjects already referred to, the geography and ethnology of Nepal and other Himalayan regions, including the question of trade routes and the capabilities of these regions for profitable cultivation by Europeans. More than half of the above papers were concerned with the zoology of these countries. His chief claim, however, to fame is his discovery of the literature of Northern Buddhism in the remote valley of Nepal, which had served as an asylum for that religion on its disappearance from India from the twelfth century to the fifteenth. Here he collected between the years 1827 and 1845 in all 354 MSS., which were at first sent to British collections, but afterwards, with a discrimination not unjustified by results, to Paris, for the use of the great Orientalist Burnouf, who founded on them his monumental work on Buddhism, dedicated in part to Mr. Hodgson, "comme au fondateur de la véritable étude du Bouddhisme, par les textes et les monuments."

His friendly relations with the neighbouring Buddhist powers in Tibet procured for Mr. Hodgson the princely donation from the Grand Lama of a complete copy of the Tibetan version of the Buddhist scriptures in 334 vols. These were presented to the India Office, where they may now be seen. Mr. Hodgson's writings on the ethnography, languages, and antiquities of the Himalayan peoples are still of much value to scholars, and indeed in many cases remain unique after the lapse of fifty years. Yet it is impossible not to feel that their value is at times impaired by want of controlling literary attainments, especially in Sanskrit, on the part of the writer, so that the reader cannot clearly distinguish the really valuable results of the writer's own accurate observation from the less trustworthy material supplied by native informants of varying degrees of knowledge and intelligence.

In zoology his collections represent an extraordinary energy during a space of twenty years already busily occupied in political and literary pursuits. His specimens, mainly birds, reached the surprising total of 10,499. All these were presented to the British Museum, which retained a complete series, passing on duplicates to other scientific institutions.

Soon after leaving India in 1858 Mr. Hodgson went to live in Gloucestershire, where most of the remainder of his long life has been spent. It is worthy of note that since that time little or nothing, save republication of old materials, issued from his once active pen. The moral, so to say, seems irresistible that one should not be a country gentleman if one can be anything better. In later years his noble and erect figure has been familiar to winter residents at Mentone, where he built himself a villa within quite the last few years. His services were at once recognized in France by the award (in 1838) of the Legion of Honour, as well as by the membership of the Institute; much more tardily (1877) by our own Royal Society. Of the Asiatic societies in this and other countries Mr. Hodgson had long been an honoured member. Finally, as lately as 1889, the University of Oxford, after some fifty years, awoke to his claims to an honorary degree. The Government of India, however, appears to have considered its obligations discharged by the usual pension and official letters of thanks. In this country it would seem that a lifelong devotion to literature and science, even when associated with munificence, does not take rank with the achievements of a successful lawyer or hospitable mayor. B.

'ENGLISH BARDS AND SCOTCH REVIEWERS.'

May 26, 1894.

MY notes and queries have had the good fortune to elicit so much valuable information regarding the tortuous bibliographical career of this book, that I feel tempted to summarize briefly the facts which have been brought forward.

First Edition, n.d. [March, 1809].—Genuine copies have the water-marks "E & P 1804" or "E & P 1805," and one, supposed to be genuine, has no water-mark at all. My own has "E & P 1805." Mr. Murray's spurious copy has "S & C Wise 1812," and one seen by Mr. Dobell had the date either 1811 or 1812. Comparisons of the genuine with spurious issues revealed many points of difference, but a detailed collation is wanting. I have not seen a spurious copy.

Second Edition, [October] 1809.—Only one copy has been cited. It bears the water-mark "Budge & Wilmott | 1808." Mr. Bromley's collation (so far as it goes) agrees with my own copy; but I may mention a misprint which will be useful in comparison. P. 80 begins with l. 1007, thus misprinted:—

Let ABEDEEN and ELAIN still pursue.

I agree with Mr. Dobell's suggestions that the second is the rarest of all the editions, and that (probably) it was not counterfeited.

Third Edition, 1810.—The only copy cited which seems to have a decided claim to be considered genuine is that of Rosa-spina, the water-mark of which is "E & P 1804." The evidence for Mr. Dobell's copy rests, so far, only on the absence of a date in the water-mark, "G & R T." A collation with Rosa-spina's copy would be interesting. The correspondence shows that one may expect to find almost any date (later than 1810) on spurious issues of the "third," for water-marks of the following years have been cited—1812, 1815, 1816, 1817, 1818; Mr. Lane-Poole's copy being made up of sheets dated variously 1815, 1816, 1817, and nothing at all. The spurious third (Mr. Baguley's copy and mine) has the misprint "crawl" for scarav in l. 47 (not "l. 13"). Mr. Baguley will find, I think, that the fifth line of p. 76 runs thus:—

in all editions.

Fourth Edition, 1810 and 1811.—I said that "I know of no reason for doubting the genuineness" of either of the fourth editions I cited, but am now disposed to agree with Mr. Murray in assuming the only genuine "fourth" to be that which is dated 1811, and which has the water-mark "J. Whatman 1806." Only one copy of the "fourth" purporting to be published by Cawthorn (alone), and with 1810 on the title-page, has been cited except my own. I have two which seem to be identical. The preface is headed "Preface to the Third Edition," and there is no foot-note, as in the 1811 copies. The paper is a little thicker than ordinary, and bears the water-mark "G & R T" (no date)—the same as one of Mr. Dobell's "thirds." The page is unusually long, 8½ in., the width being 4½ in. The lines, as usual, are numbered by tens, but in this issue there are frequent gaps—e.g., there is no numbering between "810" and "840." The last line is numbered "1060," and Cawthorn's advertisements (3 pp.) begin on the back of p. 85, filling up the last sheet of the book, which consists of four sheets (sig. A—D) of twelve leaves each. Mr. Bagguley's copy has no water-mark.

I have not seen a copy of the spurious issue (or issues) of 1811, cited by Mr. Murray (water-mark "J X 1814") and by Mr. Lane-Poole (water-mark "W. Pickering & Co. 1816"). Both my copies dated 1811 are on very thick paper, with the same water-mark as Mr. Murray's "genuine" copy—"J. Whatman 1805"—and agree with Mr. Lane-Poole's spurious one in having 1,052 lines, the two publishers' names on the title-page, and the foot-note to the "Preface." This foot-note is cited in the standard edition (one vol., p. 420 n.) as having appeared in the "fourth edition, 1811," which would have constituted an implied authority for judging the fourth of 1811 to be the genuine issue, but that in another note on the same page the "fourth" is mentioned as having been published during Byron's absence from England—a manifest error, for the alterations in the poem which raised the number of lines from 1,060 to 1,052 must have been made by Byron himself after his return to England. It may be assumed, however, I think, that the "fourth" of 1811, with 1,052 lines, printed on Whatman's paper, is the genuine issue.

Another question which arises is this—how many of these spurious firsts, thirds, and fourths were English piracies, and how many Irish? Byron seems to have attributed most of them to Dublin pirates, and in the article in the Athenæum of September 10th, 1831, which gives the readings of the suppressed fifth, the writer says:—

"If the reader of these few lines will have the goodness to reach down from his shelves the fourth edition of 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers'—(and thanks to Dublin liberality few lovers of English poetry are without a fourth [italic in original] edition), I will," &c.

Perhaps something might be gleaned from the various water-marks of the spurious copies, for there may be Irish devices among them.

I have compared the readings noted in the Athenæum article (1831) with the text of the 'English Bards' in the one-volume standard edition of Byron's 'Works,' and find the following differences, which Mr. Murray will perhaps be kind enough to verify by reference to his probably unique copy of the "fifth" edition. (References are to one-volume edition.)

P. 422.

This—that—and t'other line seem incorrect.

Athenæum has "or" and "seems."

P. 426. To the line, on Hayley,

Or dams the dead with purgatorial praise, the Athenæum cites the following foot-note, not given here:—"See his various biographisms of defunct painters, &c."

P. 428 n.

"In 1806, Messrs. Jeffrey and Moore met at Chalk Farm. The duel.....daily prints. [The above note was struck out of the fifth edition, and the following, after being submitted to Mr. Moore, substituted in its place:—I am informed.....very lately, November 4, 1811.]"

The Athenæum says, "The following additional note ["I am informed," &c.] is inserted."

P. 429. (The new passage, on Jeffrey.)

When Scotland pampers with her fiery grain reads in the Athenæum "the"; and for

This scents its pages, and that gilds its rear, the Athenæum reads "that adorns its rear."

These are all the differences I have observed, but I may add here that George Lamb (note to l. 56) was called "ingenuous" in all editions except the fourth (1810 and 1811), where the word was misprinted "ingenious."

I have to apologize for naming Hodgson as the writer of the lines on Bowles in the first edition. Hobhouse was their author, and I agree with Mr. Bromley (and Byron) in thinking them better than those to which they gave place. They are quoted in a foot-note in the one-volume edition, with two misprints (I put the correct readings in brackets):—

And when (where) a comment fails, prefix a life;

Review (revive) forgotten lies, and add your own.

Another misprint in the one-volume edition is in the line (p. 427, third of first column):—

If chance some bard, though once by dunces fear'd.

The word should be "chance" (for "perchance"). It is correctly printed in the second, the spurious third, and in the genuine fourth (1811); and incorrectly in the "fourth" of 1810.

MR. BERTRAM DOBELL, whose letter appears in your issue of to-day, must, I think, be mistaken when he says the genuine first edition of this satire has no water-mark on it, as I have a copy, of course without date on title-page, which has the water-mark "E & P 1805" on pp. 25 and 37. The poem bears the imprint, "T. Collins, Printer, No. 1, Harvey's Buildings, Strand."

T. O. S. CORRY, M.D.

26, Princes Street, Edinburgh, May 20, 1894.

IN connexion with Mr. Dobell's letter on the first edition of this book, will you allow me to point out that a copy of the genuine issue now in my possession has the water-mark "E & P 1805" on the third leaf of sheet C. Mr. Dobell states that he found no water-mark on his copy. Mr. Murray's is similar to mine.

I observe that one of your correspondents quotes the water-mark of the third issue as "E & P 1804."

W. BROWN.

Great Claybrooke, Lutterworth, May 20, 1894.

My copy of the third edition of 'English Bards' is another variation in the growth of the forgery. The title-page, &c., exactly resembles that given by Rosa-spina and Mr. J. Haines, but the water-mark is "Ivy Mills 1817."

E. H. BATES.

SOCKET & SOT.

King's Inns Library, Dublin, May 2, 1894.

THE nursery rhyme quoted in your review of Mrs. Gomme's book, and more fully by Mr. Daniel in your last issue, ran, as I recollect it in my nursery days, some forty years ago in co. Tyrone, as follows:—

Who comes here?

A Grenadier.

What do you want?—A pint of beer.

Where's your money?—In my pocket.

Where's your pocket?—I've forgot it.

Get you gone, you drunken blockhead.

Possibly "blockhead" was a corruption of "socket," the word in Mr. Daniel's version.

JAMES MAC IVOR.

110, Brocknock Road, May 20, 1894.

THE "sot" version of the old nursery rhyme is perhaps not so "distressingly modern" as Mr. Daniel seems to suppose. It is given in that form in Henry Carey's burlesque poem 'Namy Pamby,' published in 1725 or 1726:—

Now he acts the Grenadier,

Calling for a pot of beer,

Where's his money? He's forgot.

Get him gone, a drunken sot.

DAVID WILLIAMS.

May 24, 1894.

WILL you allow me to cap the version given by Mr. Perceval in your issue of the 19th inst.? An old nurse, Mrs. Gale, taught us the words. She dressed us up in a cocked hat made out of a newspaper, with a tin gun on the shoulder and a wooden sword on the hip:—

Child enters, strutting grandly.

Nurse. Who comes here?

Child. A Grenadier!

Nurse. What do you want?

Child. A pot of beer!

Nurse. Where's your money?

Child. I forgot!

Nurse. Get along, you drunken sot!

Then followed a tickling. This was delightful eighty years ago or more. I was born in 1806, and left the nursery about the time of the battle of Waterloo, when a wounded soldier taught me the lance exercise on Picklo, our pony.

H. P. M. (a Wiltshire boy).

Lincoln's Inn.

WHEN I was issuing from the nursery, about 1830-5 A.D., my mother used to sing for my delectation all the best-known nursery rhymes, accompanying herself on the pianoforte. I always supposed that she had learned them in her childhood, and I may mention that she was born in Oxfordshire in 1799. Her version of "the Grenadier" was as follows:—

Who comes here?

A Grenadier.

What d'you want?

A pot of beer.

Where's your money?

I forgot!

Get you gone, you drunken sot!

I never heard of the word "socket" as connected with this little nursery drama until I saw (I am afraid I am rather Hibernian in my phraseology) Mr. P. A. Daniel's version in your columns.

ALMARIC RUMSEY.

New York, May 15, 1894.

My grandmother, who, if now living, would be almost a hundred years old, used to repeat to me fifty years ago the nursery rhyme to which Mr. P. A. Daniel refers in your issue of May 5th. She gave it as she had learned it in childhood in South Berwick, Maine, then a part of Massachusetts.

As she gave them, the lines ran as follows:—

Who comes here?—A Grenadier (pronounced Grannyder).

What do you want?—A bottle of beer.

Where's your money?—I forgot.

Get you gone, you drunken sot.

I think it more likely that she said "pottle" than "bottle," but as I was then unfamiliar with the word "pottle" it seemed to me that "bottle" was the word my grandmother used. The lines were surely widely known in this form in New England anywhere from fifty to a hundred years ago.

SUSAN HAYES WARD.

* * We have also received a letter from Clarence Cook, of New York, in which he says that in his boyhood he heard at Boston, Mass., the version given in Halliwell's 'Nursery Rhymes.' We cannot insert further communications on this subject.

THE HON. RODEN NOEL.

BY the death of Mr. Roden Noel at the age of fifty-nine we have lost a writer sincerely devoted to his art and possessed of much cultivation and high aims. He was born in 1834, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his M.A. degree in 1858. He married in 1863, and in the same year he published 'Behind the Veil, and other Poems,' a volume which showed many signs of the influence of Shelley, but attracted considerable attention. 'Beatrice, and other Poems' (1868), hardly achieved the popularity for which the author hoped; nor did 'The Red Flag' (1872) and 'Livingstone in Africa' (1874), although marked by high purpose and fine feeling, make much way with the public. A new edition of the former volume was issued, however, in 1883. A greater success was achieved by 'A Little Child's Monument' (1881), a work of genuine feeling, in which the author, moved by the loss of his child, obtained a greater hold on his readers by the simple expression of grief than by his philosophical poetry. In 1886 he, under the title of 'Essays upon Poetry and Poets,' collected his reviews, which showed not merely a real love of poetry, but considerable critical acumen and a power of forming his own opinions which made the book more satisfactory than such reprints usually are. Mr. Noel published other volumes of verse, but although they won the praise of some highly competent judges, such as the late Mr. Addington Symonds, he never gained the ear of the general public. An eminently thoughtful writer, he lacked singing power, his versification was frequently harsh, and, except in 'A Little Child's Monu ment,' his poetry gave his readers the idea of being rather the work of deliberation and reflection than of inspiration. It is to be feared that his failure to obtain general acceptance weighed upon his spirits, and of late years ill-health had withdrawn him from general society; but to those who knew him well he remained a constant and attached friend, and his death will be sincerely deplored.

Literary Gossip.

MESSRS. LONGMAN will publish this summer the lectures Prof. Froude has delivered at Oxford on the life and letters of Erasmus. There has been no small grumbling, by the way, at the University that the ladies come in such numbers to hear the eloquent professor that undergraduates can find no room, nor graduates either.

ANOTHER bit of news from Oxford is that the third volume of Canon Liddon's biography of Pusey will be issued by Messrs. Longman in the autumn.

THE many admirers and readers of Miss Rhoda Broughton will sympathize with her in the terrible blow which she has recently sustained by the death of Mrs. Newcome, her devoted friend and sister. Mrs. Newcome was not only a woman of a most cultivated wit and deep affections, but of a perfect purity of nature which lent to her whole life and conversation a rare and singular charm. To all those who knew her well her memory will be that of irreplaceable loss.

THE London Medical Schools have appointed a committee to report on the Grosvenor University scheme. To meet the difficulty arising from the relatively small representation (three out of fifteen) assigned to the Medical Faculty in the Academic Council, it will probably be suggested to increase the Council, say, to eighteen, and assign a third of the votes to the Faculties of Science and Medicine respectively, and diminish the representation of the Faculty of Arts, Law, &c.

THE Royal Historical Society has decided, at the suggestion of Mr. Frederic Harrison, to take steps to commemorate the centenary of the death of Gibbon in a suitable manner. A representative committee is being formed for this purpose, and it is hoped that arrangements may be made for the delivery of an address as well as for an exhibition of portraits, MSS., and other relics of the great historian during the ensuing autumn. Those who are willing to assist in this work are requested to communicate with either of the honorary secretaries, Mr. P. E. Dove, 1, Stone Buildings, Lincoln's Inn, and Mr. Hubert Hall, 3, Staple Inn, W.C.

THE sum collected for the Booksellers' Home at the seaside amounts to about eight hundred pounds. Mr. C. Longman has become President of the new institution. Mr. Bain, Mr. J. C. Francis, Mr. E. Green, Mr. F. Macmillan, Mr. R. B. Marston, Mr. John Murray, and Mr. H. C. Sotheran have become Vice-Presidents. Among the contributors of 10*l.* 10*s.* since we last mentioned the subscriptions have been Messrs. Blackie & Son, Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode, Messrs. Nelson & Son, Messrs. Stevens & Sons, the Hon. W. F. D. Smith, Messrs. Venable, Tyler & Sons, and Messrs. J. Whitaker & Sons. As Mr. Darton, to whom the movement owes much, explained at the meeting last week, the home is not intended to be a convalescent home in the ordinary sense of the word, but one where the members of the trade may obtain the comforts of home life at a very small cost, when they need a holiday.

THE little story which appears in the June number of the English Illustrated Magazine, entitled 'Measure for Measure,' is from the pen of the Duchess of Sutherland, whose somewhat transparent pseudonym embodies her own and her husband's family names. The Duchess of Sutherland, it will be remembered, wrote some time ago, when Marchioness of Stafford, a little book 'How I Spent my Twenty-first Year.'

MESSRS. LONGMAN have in the press Mr. Julian Sturgis's new volume 'A Book of Song,' and also a book by Canon MacColl on 'Life Here and Hereafter.'

COL. LLOYD-VERNEY's account of the Militia battalions of the county of Southampton from 1757 to the present day is to be published by Messrs. Longman. It will be accompanied by a notice of the Militia Artillery of the county by Col. Mount Hunt.

VERNON LEE is going to deliver some lectures this season at Mrs. Humphry Ward's house in Grosvenor Place.

MRS. WIGGIN, the well-known American writer, has arrived in London from the United States.

A NEW volume by Mr. Edward Garnett, which Messrs. Dent & Co. are publishing, is almost ready, entitled 'An Imaged World,' consisting of a series of poems in prose, some few of which have already appeared in the Speaker, although by far the largest portion of the book has not been published before. It will be illustrated with five landscape drawings by Mr. William Hyde, reproduced in photogravure. Messrs. Dent have also in preparation a new edition of Coleridge, edited by the Rev. Stopford Brooke.

CANON ATKINSON writes from Danby in Cleveland:—

"Touching its being 'against the rule' in Cumberland 'for fathers and mothers of the couple who are to be united to attend a marriage,' will this be a further example? I have been at work in this parish more than forty-seven years, and in all that time I can remember the presence of two 'fathers' (of one or other of the couple to be united), and not one of a 'mother.' I advert to the circumstance in one of the appendices to the third or fourth edition of my 'Forty Years in a Moorland Parish.' I do not know that there is any recognized 'rule'; but I can speak to the 'practice,' and my experience must include some four or five hundred weddings."

At a meeting of the Council of the Scottish History Society held on Tuesday last, at the Signet Library, Edinburgh, it was resolved to print the journals of Prince Charlie's secretary, the "traitor" John Murray of Broughton. The most fresh and graphic portion of these journals, which will be edited by Mr. R. Fitzroy Bell, is that concerning the secret negotiations and preparations, which were going on longer than is generally supposed both in Scotland and abroad, before the landing of the Prince.

THE Society has also in hand the publication of a series of documents, extracted from the State archives at the Hague by Dr. J. Meindels, in illustration of the history of the Scots Brigade in Holland from 1575 to the close of the last century. It is a field that has hitherto been untouched, at least for this purpose. The work will be edited by Mr. James Ferguson, author of 'Robert Ferguson, the Plotter.' As an appendix to these documents, or as a volume apart, there will be printed the registers of baptisms and marriages performed by the chaplains of the several regiments from 1708 to 1782. These latter records are now preserved in four folio volumes at Rotterdam.

MR. GEORGE PROTHERO writes:—

"Your reviewer, in noticing my 'Select Statutes, &c., of Elizabeth and James I.,' found 'one little slip,' on p. 421, in which Whigitt's name appears wrongly in the place of Bancroft's. If he had looked at the 'Corrigenda' he would have found this, and one or two other slips, already corrected."

MESSRS. OSGOOD, McLEVINE & Co. are going to issue a uniform edition of Mr. Hardy's novels. There has hitherto been difficulty in the way of this, as more than one publisher had an interest in Mr. Hardy's works.

REFERRING to the letter of General Merodith Read in the Athenæum concerning the Reade ancestors of Washington, the New York Nation adds, from the Virginia Historical Magazine, that the wife of George Reade, who emigrated to Virginia, was Elizabeth, daughter of Capt. Nicholas Martian. She was thus the great-grandmother of the President.

THE serial story Mrs. W. K. Clifford has written for the Illustrated London News will appear simultaneously in America and Australia. It is called 'A Flash of Summer,' and will be illustrated by Mr. G. P. Jacob Hood. The first number will appear in July.

IN the course of the last three years the Bodleian Library has had the good fortune to acquire hundreds of fragments of Hebrew MSS. coming from Egypt, which will throw light on the post-Talmudic literature, and more especially on the early hymnology in the synagogues. There are also many old fragments of the Talmud. From another source Dr. M. Gaster was so lucky as to procure for his private library some MSS., one of them having a different text of the legends in the Talmud, and another explaining the tradition of the kepaia (Matt. v. 18; Luke xvi. 17), i.e., the Hebrew ḥayyot, as well as the tradition of the early method of writing synagogue scrolls. This tradition, which is most likely pre-Masoretic, was lost as early as the twelfth century, when the great Maimonides decided to omit these signs in the scrolls, for fear that the tradition would not be truly represented. Besides the kepaia there are special forms for certain letters, on which the Midrashic doctors make comments. Dr. Gaster's MS., which we believe is at latest of the twelfth century, and is written in Hebraico-Persian characters, deserves to be made public by a photographic process, as it represents the form of writing Pentateuch scrolls for synagogues during the last epoch of the second Temple. It is not impossible that the peculiar forms of letters may have influenced the translations of Aquila, Theo-dotion, and Symmachus. For the present Dr. Gaster's MS. is unique, and therefore of great value.

SOME new fragments of the Palestinian-Syriac translation of the Old Testament will be published in the "Anecdota Oxoniensia" by the Rev. G. H. Gwilliam: 1. From a palimpsest in the Bodleian Library containing a few verses of Exodus, already mentioned in the Athenæum. 2. A few verses of 2 Kings, copied at St. Catharine's, Mount Sinai, by Mr. Stenning, Wadham College, Oxford. 3. A few verses of Job, brought from the same source by Prof. Rendel Harris.

MR. FARJEON, in his new novel, 'Aaron the Jew,' which Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. will publish, endeavours to portray the Jew of to-day, and has taken especial pains with his two principal characters, Aaron and his wife.

A PORTRAIT of Dr. Garnett, Keeper of the Printed Books in the British Museum, has been etched by Mrs. T. W. Morris, and will shortly be published by Messrs. Ellis & Elvey. Mrs. Morris is the daughter of the late Keeper, Mr. George Bullen.

ALEXANDER DAQUET, the venerable Swiss historian and pedagogue, died at Neuchâtel a few days ago. He was born at Fribourg in 1816, and studied in the Jesuit College of that city. His political sympathies at the outbreak of the civil war of the Sonderbund drove him from his native canton; but after the war he was appointed to the rectorship of the Cantonal School, was elected a member of the Great Council (1849 to 1857), and edited a literary periodical. Political conflicts, however, led him finally to leave Fribourg, and in 1866 he was called to the Chair of History in the Academy of Neuchâtel, and soon afterwards to the rectorship of the High School for Girls, which he held until 1892. His principal work, the 'Histoire de la Confédération Suisse,' was first published in 1851. It has passed through seven editions, and has been translated into German, Italian, and Spanish. His 'Manuel de Pédagogie, ou l'Éducation,' the first edition of which appeared in 1871, has been almost as successful. A fifth edition was published in 1885. His latest historical work, the 'Histoire de la Ville et Seigneurie de Fribourg,' which he had only brought as far as the year 1481, was published five years ago.

THE residence of Thomas Paine in Paris from 1797 to 1802 has been identified by Mr. Moncure Conway as No. 4, Rue de l'Odéon, at that time No. 4, Rue du Théâtre Français. He resided with Nicolas de Bonneville, whom he assisted in editing the Bouche de Fer, and who translated into French several of Paine's productions of this period. Paine bequeathed his property to Madame Bonneville and her children. Proofs that the curious old house is the identical one have been submitted to eminent official gentlemen in Paris.

THE death is announced of General Matthew M. Trumbull, at Chicago, on the 11th ult., aged sixty-eight. General Trumbull, who was a native of London, emigrated to America forty-seven years ago, served with distinction in the Civil War, and held various offices in that country. His chief works are 'History of the Free-Trade Struggle in England' and 'Articles and Discussions on the Labour Question.' He was connected with the Monitor and the Open Court, in Chicago, and had long been a voluminous contributor to American periodicals on economic, political, and philosophical subjects.

TWO volumes of important autograph manuscripts of Sir Walter Scott will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge this month. The one contains the complete manuscript of 'Anne of Geierstein,' given by Scott to Robert Cadell in April, 1831; the other contains all the manuscript of 'Ivanhoe' that was written by Scott himself, the greater portion of the novel having been dictated by him; the autograph manuscript of a portion of 'Waverley,' and sundry other fragments. It is to be hoped these manuscripts will not leave the country.

THANKS to a convention between the Governments of Austria, Bavaria, Prussia, and Saxony, the financial conditions of the publication of the 'Thesaurus Lingue Latine' have been secured. It is estimated that this stupendous work, in the compilation of which several German academies of sciences will co-operate, will be finished in twenty years, and cost about 600,000 marks.

MR. J. W. CLARK, the Bode Lecturer of this year, has taken for his subject the arrangements of libraries in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, and will illustrate his lucubrations with lantern slides.

THE Parliamentary Papers likely to be of the most general interest to our readers this week are the Annual Report of the Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in England, 1892; Report on Admiralty Surveys for 1893 (2d.); Labour Commission, Vol. XI., Austria-Hungary and the Balkan States (2s. 11d.); Report of the Committee appointed to enquire into the Entrance Examinations (in non-military subjects) of Candidates for Commissions in the Army (2s. 9d.); Abstract of Accounts of the University of Aberdeen for the Year ending September 15th, 1893 (3d.); and Statute made by the Governing Body of Christ Church, Oxford, altering Statutes XXII. and XXIII. (1d.).

SCIENCE

MR. G. J. ROMANES, F.R.S.

THE death, not altogether unexpected, of Mr. Romanes, at the early age of forty-six, has removed the most fertile of English writers on the philosophy and theories of modern biology. Although his speculations were by no means universally accepted, it is not, assuredly, among his critics or opponents that his loss will be least lamented; for his kindness of heart and simplicity of disposition endeared him to his adversaries as much as his admirers.

Endowed with enough of wealth to render him independent, he early became engrossed in various lines of research. Although not the first in the field, he made some notable if not classical experiments on the nervous system of jellyfishes; and if his observations, in conjunction with Prof. Ewart, on the nervous system of starfishes were not the first of their kind, it must be allowed that only one English naturalist, and that a student of the system of echinoids, appeared to possess any acquaintance with the work of Loven. These investigations were, perhaps, more satisfactory than the much more difficult task of gauging the mental capacity of Sally, the well known chimpanzee at the Zoological Gardens.

To the public Mr. Romanes was best known as the prophet and apologist of Darwin, and, more recently, as the critic of Prof. Weismann, who has lately delivered the third lecture on the foundation established by Romanes at Oxford a few years ago. In the numerous essays dealing with points of Darwinian doctrine our deceased friend exhibited a marvellous fertility, but all will own that the epithet of "the Gladstone of biology" was one that he did a good deal to bring upon himself.

Very happily married, Mr. Romanes made his home in the Regent's Park, and his house there was for about the decade 1880-90 one of the chief centres of scientific society in London; but, unfortunately, his constitution was unable to bear the double burden of intellectual and social activity, and he established himself in Oxford, where he hoped for more quiet and greater opportunity for exercise. Ill-omened signs multiplied as time went on, and changes of air and scene brought only temporary relief.

For some years Mr. Romanes had some share in the editing of our contemporary Nature; he acted for a time as Zoological Secretary to the Linnean Society, and he was one of the first secretaries of the Physiological Society.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

THE Annual Visitation of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, is held this day, June 2nd.

The well-known selenographer Mr. T. Gwyn Elger, F.R.A.S., is about to publish, through Messrs. Philip & Son, a map of the moon on a copperplate engraving with disc 18 inches in diameter, and accompanied by letterpress description of the principal formations.

We have received the number of the Memorie della Società degli Spettroscopisti Italiani for April, containing Prof. Tacchini's account of his observations of the solar phenomena during the first quarter of the present year, and a note on their heliographical distribution in the last quarter of 1893. The spots appear to be now diminishing, both in number and extent.

Prof. L. Swift notifies in Ast. Nach. No. 3229 his removal from the Warner Observatory, Rochester, N.Y. (which no longer exists), to the Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, Los Angeles Co., California, to which all the instruments, including the 16-inch refractor, have been transported.

The planet Mercury is at greatest eastern elongation from the sun on the morning of the 23rd inst., and, being about that time at great northern declination in the constellation Gemini, will probably be visible for a brief interval after sunset. Venus is still a morning star, passing in the course of the month from Aries into Taurus; she will be in conjunction with the horned waning moon on the 30th. Mars rises a little after midnight at the beginning, and a little before it at the end, of the month; he will be in conjunction with the moon, then entering her last quarter, on the morning of the 26th. Jupiter, being in conjunction with the sun on the 4th, is not visible in any part of the night; but Saturn, which is stationary in the constellation Virgo, is well placed for observation in the evening, and will be in conjunction with the moon on the 12th.

Gale's comet (b, 1894) is now nearly on the southern prolongation of a line drawn through δ and γ Ursa Majoris. The true date of discovery, it appears, was April 1st, and the comet's brightness has diminished to less than the half of that which it had then.

SALE.

THE interesting libraries—interesting, that is, to lovers of natural history—formed by the late Mr. Jenner Weir and the late Mr. Horace Francis, were dispersed by Mr. J. C. Stevens on Monday last. Zoological Society Proceedings, 1877 to 1893, Part 3, and Index, 1871-80 and 1881-90, together 17 vols., brought 31l. 10s. Vols. 1 to 22 of the Catalogue of the Birds in the British Museum, by Sharpe, Seebohm, Gadow, Sclater, Salvadori, and others, fetched 18l. 10s. Hewitson's Illustrations of New Species of Exotic Butterflies, 5 vols., brought 22l. Felder's Novara Expedition (Lepidoptera, Rhopalocera) brought 10l. 10s. Scudder's Butterflies of the Eastern United States and Canada, 3 vols., 10l. Genera of Diurnal Lepidoptera, by Doubleday, Westwood, and Hewitson, 2 vols., 18l. Häbner's Sammlung Europäische Schmetterlinge, 24l. Curtis's Botanical Magazine, complete from the commencement to the end of 1892, 90l.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—May 21.—Lord Kelvin, President, in the chair.—Prof. Mascart (Foreign Member) was admitted into the Society.—The following papers were read:—'On the Dynamical Theory of Incompressible Viscous Fluids, and the Determination of the Criterion,' by Prof. O. Reynolds;—'Measurements of the Absolute Specific Resistance of Pure Electrolytic Copper,' by Messrs. J. W. Swan and J. Rhodin;—'On some Voltaic Combinations with a Fused Electrolyte and a Gaseous Depolariser,' by Mr. J. W. Swan;—'On certain Functions connected with Tesseral Harmonics, with Applications,' by Prof. A. H. Leahy;—'On the Measurement of the Magnetic Properties of Iron,' by Prof. T. Gray;—'Researches on the Electrical Properties of Pure Substances: No. 1, The Electrical Properties of Pure Sulphur,' by Prof. Threlfall, Mr. J. H. D. Brearley, and Mr. J. B. Allen;—and 'On the Influence of certain Natural Agents on the Virulence of the Tubercle-Bacillus,' by Dr. A. Ransome and Dr. Delépine.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—May 28.—Anniversary Meeting.—Mr. C. R. Markham, President, in the chair.—During the meeting the Royal Medals for the Encouragement of Geographical Science and Discovery were awarded. The Founder's Medal to Capt. H. Bower, for his very remarkable journey right across Tibet from west to east, from the borders of Ladakh to the borders of China, at least one-half of which lay through country which had never before been explored, and of which our geographical knowledge was absolutely nothing. This belt of country lies between the frontier of Ladakh and the main road from Lhasa to the north, and is nearly one thousand miles in length. Beyond that road eastwards his route occasionally crossed, and was never any great distance from, the route taken by M. Bonvalot and Prince Henry of Orleans the year before, and that taken by Mr. Rockhill the year after; but the survey work which he performed is very valuable for the rectification of the already existing maps of this region. Capt. Bower was the first Englishman who has been allowed by the Government of India to travel in Tibet during the present century.—The Patron's Medal to M. Eliézer Reclus, for having devoted his life to the study of comparative geography. His method of working involved not only an exhaustive analysis of geographical literature, but also personal investigation in many lands. The labours of twenty years have resulted in the publication, completed in 1893, of twenty-one volumes. Of these two form a general treatise on physical geography, under the title of 'La Terre,' and nineteen make up the most comprehensive systematic work of the kind ever carried out. Entitled 'Nouvelle Géographie Universelle, la Terre et les Hommes,' it gives a full account of the present geographical condition of all the continents, and is accompanied by more than 3,600 maps and about 1,500 other illustrations. The work is planned philosophically, its execution is characterised by impartial judgment, and it is of high literary and scientific merit.—The following other awards were also declared:—The Murchison Grant for 1894 to Capt. J. Wiggins for his services, extending over a quarter of a century, in opening up the Kara Sea route to Northern Siberia, and the navigation of the river Yenisei.—The Hack Grant (two years) to Capt. H. J. Snow, for his rectification of the map of the Kurile Islands, the result of observations made during many years' voyages amongst those islands.—The Gill Memorial to Mr. G. E. Ferguson, for his excellent survey work on the West Coast of Africa.—The Cuthbert Peek Grant to Dr. J. W. Gregory, for his journey to Lake Baringo and Mount Kenia, and his series of useful scientific observations.—The scholarships and prizes given by the Royal Geographical Society to students in training colleges for 1894 was also presented.—The following gentlemen were elected as Council and officers for 1894-5: President, C. R. Markham; Vice-Presidents, W. T. Blanford, Hon. G. C. Brodick, Hon. G. N. Curzon, Sir J. Hooker, General H. Strachey, and Capt. W. J. L. Wharton; Treasurer, E. L. Somers Cocks; Trustees, Right Hon. Lord Aberdare and Right Hon. Sir J. Lubbock; Hon. Secretaries, H. Seebohm and Major L. Darwin; Honorary Secretary, Sir J. Kirk; Councilors, Vice-Admiral L. Brice, R. Brown, Lieut.-Col. J. C. Dalton, Right Hon. H. G. E. Childers, Lieut.-General W. H. Goodenough, Sir G. D. Taubman Goldie, Major-General Sir F. J. Goldsmid, General Sir T. E. Gordon, W. Huddleston, Lord Lamington, J. K. Laughton, G. S. Mackenzie, Rear-Admiral A. H. Markham, J. Murray, E. G. Ravenstein, Sir R. W. Rawson, Howard Saunders, Col. H. C. B. Tanner, Rear-Admiral E. H. Seymour, Lieut.-Col. C. M. Watson, and Lieut.-Col. J. K. Trotter.—The annual address on the progress of geography during the year was delivered by the President.

GEOLOGICAL.—May 23.—Dr. H. Woodward, President, in the chair.—Messrs. A. E. Walton and A. P. Wilson were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read:—'On the Stratigraphy and Physiography of the Libyan Desert of Egypt,' by Capt. H. O. Lyons;—'Notes on the Geology of South Africa,' and 'On the Occurrence of Dolomite in South Africa,' by Mr. D. Draper;—and 'Contributions to the Geology of British East Africa,' by Mr. J. W. Gregory.

LINNEAN.—May 24.—Anniversary Meeting.—Prof. Stewart, President, in the chair.—Messrs. G. B. Rothera and W. F. Wilkinson were admitted Fellows.—The Treasurer presented his Annual Report duly audited, and the Secretary having announced the elections and deaths during the past twelve months, the usual ballot took place for new Members of Council, when the following were elected: Dr. J. Anderson, C. B. Clarke, Prof. J. R. Green, A. Lister, and A. D. Michael.—On a ballot taking place for the election of President and officers, Mr. C. B. Clarke was nominated President, and the officers were re-elected.—The Librarian's Report having been read, and certain formal business disposed of, the retiring President delivered his Annual Address, taking for his subject 'The Locomotion of Animals with special reference to the Crustacea.'—The Society's Gold Medal was then formally awarded to Prof. K. Haeckel, of Jena, for his important researches in invertebrate zoology, especially in relation to the Medusae and the Rotifers. It was received on his behalf by Mr. W. P. Sladen, who read a letter of acknowledgment and thanks, which was prefaced by an expression of the writer's regret at his inability to come to England to receive the medal in person.

MICROSCOPICAL.—May 16.—Mr. A. D. Michael, President, in the chair.—Mr. C. L. Curtiss exhibited and described a microscope which had been specially made for photographic purposes; the leading feature of the instrument is that the nose-piece is removable, so that an ordinary photographic lens can be substituted for the objective if required. He also exhibited a new form of apparatus for obtaining instantaneous photographs of objects under the microscope; as examples of what could be done with this apparatus he showed photomicrographs of blood corpuscles taken with it, and also some low-power photographs of living specimens of Lophopus with tentacles extended.—Dr. W. H. Dallinger thought the photomicrographs were extremely good. He noted that in the immediate vicinity of the Lophopus there were some Vorticellae, and this suggested that it might be possible to take them in the act of closing so as to get an idea how the movement was performed.—Mr. Shrubsole said he had brought to the meeting a few living specimens of Gromia, which were shown under one of the microscopes on the table. One peculiarity of these specimens was that instead of possessing but one aperture, there was a zone of small apertures round a central one; this he thought was a good reason why this object should be removed from the Monostoma. After describing a naked rhizopod closely allied to Lieberkuhnia, and an organism resembling Shephardella, Mr. Shrubsole said he had on the previous day obtained from the water off Sheerness some masses of a dirty-looking substance containing all sorts of forms of gelatinous objects in which were embedded a number of granules; they were the cause of what the fishermen called "foul water" or "May water." They were only seen at certain seasons and for a short time, and it would be an interesting inquiry to find out what became of them.—Prof. F. Jeffrey Bell said that he had just been present at the annual inspection of the Marine Biological Laboratory at Plymouth, and he found that one of the greatest troubles there had been the condition of the water. Only two fish had died during the last twelve months, but the Director was desirous of obtaining information as to the diatomaceous and desmideaceous condition of the water in the tanks. Inquiries naturally suggesting themselves would be what the organisms really were which caused this "foul water"; was the "foul water" due to their presence; and were they a great number of larvae undergoing transformation? Prof. Bell called attention to the three frames of photomicrographs which formed the Society's exhibit at the Chicago Exhibition, and which had just been returned; the Fellows would have now the opportunity of seeing them, and determining whether they were worthy of the medal which they were told had been awarded the Society.

HISTORICAL.—May 24.—Mr. Hubert Hall in the chair.—The following were elected Fellows: Messrs. G. W. Prothero and A. Kingston.—A paper was read by Mr. A. O. Little 'On the Educational Organization of the Mendicant Friars in England,' in which the system of the schools was described with great minuteness and with much research.—It was announced that this paper would be printed in the Transactions of the Society.

PHYSICAL.—May 28.—Prof. A. W. Rüchler, President, in the chair.—Prof. W. Ramsay read a paper 'On the Passage of Hydrogen through a Palladium Septum, and the Pressure which it Produces.'—A paper 'On the Expansion of Rarefied Gases,' by Prof. W. Ramsay and Mr. E. C. C. Baly, was read by the latter.

FOLK-LORE.—May 23.—Mr. G. L. Gomme, President, in the chair.—Mr. H. Morrison, Mr. J. S. E. Walker, and the Brighton Town Council were elected Members.—Mr. Ordish exhibited a sword-dancer's dress, sent him by Miss Edleston, of Gainsford, near Darlington, and read a short note by that lady, giving an account of the sword-dancers' exhibition, and produced a copy of their song.—Mr. F. Sessions read a paper entitled 'The Omens of the Thugs and their Relation to European Folk-lore of Birds and Beasts,' and a discussion followed, in which the President, Dr. Gaster, Dr. Gregor, Messrs. Baverstock, Nutt, Kitts, Kirby, and Hartland took part.—Papers on 'Water and Well Worship,' by Mr. A. W. Moore, and 'The Classification of Proverbs and Sayings of the Isle of Man,' by Mr. G. W. Wood, were also read. Mr. Wood is one of the few Englishmen who have acquired a familiarity with the fast-dying Manx language, and he is therefore well qualified to deal with the subject he has taken in hand. He adopted for his classification the lines given in the Society's handbook, but he amplified the heads and sub-heads according to the exigencies of the typical Manx collection, and focussed them all under the leading divisions. This will facilitate the arrangement of other collections of proverbs. The distinction drawn between the subjective and objective aspects of proverbs seems most important. Almost invariably they have been classified hitherto objectively, i.e., according to their drift. The author has applied his taste for analysis to unravel their component parts, and has shown in a table what a large number of man's surroundings have been enlisted in his service to express thought in the pithy logic of proverbs. The words selected by a nation go far to show the nature of its pursuits. The author has pointed out that those of Man were undoubtedly fishing and agriculture, as indeed the proverbs themselves would show, even if nothing were known of the place or people. According to the table, trades are scarcely alluded to, and certainly the Isle of Man cannot be accused of being a trading community. The promised deductions from the proverbs as a whole, which the author is now working out, will be very instructive upon these and kindred points.—The President stated that Mr. Wood had analyzed the water of every holy well in the Isle of Man, and suggested that he should be asked to give an account of the results to the Society.

HELLENIC.—May 28.—Mr. Penrose, V.P., in the chair.—Miss Sellers gave a short account of recent publications in classical archaeology, and then proceeded to read a paper on a head formerly in the Palazzo Borghese, and now the property of Mr. Humphry Ward. The head (which was exhibited to the Society) is of Parian marble, and is in a remarkably perfect state of preservation. From the natural rendering of hair and eyelids, and from the extreme freshness of the modelling, there can be no doubt that it is a Greek original. While the head presented general affinities to a series of works ranging from the later archaic statues of the Akropolis Museum to earlier Phidian works, such as the Apollo in the Terme Museum and the Bologna head (recently identified by Prof. Furtwängler as a copy of the Lemnian Athena by Phidias), its more intimate qualities showed it to be most closely design trivialities like In the Arms of Morpheus (428), and to paint them so weakly and with such bad colour, he will hardly rise to much distinction.—Mr. C. N. Hemy is not at his best in Home Moorings (427), a seascape with figures; yet it indicates a fitting sense of the movements of the figures, and evinces his well-known skill in sea-painting. He has, however, worked the luminous and glittering surface of the water with a hand too heavy and with pigments too opaque, and that wealth of under-painting and surface glazings apart from which the sea is not worth painting is unfortunately absent. The movement of the boat is given with rare good fortune and skill, but the water betrays the influence of the lamp and the approaching exhaustion of the artist's resources as a sea-painter.

Mr. Wollen is before all things an illustrator. He possesses unusual facility in designing military incidents and sketching them upon canvas. Accordingly his Black Watch at Bay (435), a little group of very characteristic, and it must be owned very ugly, Scotchmen, heroically resisting the charges of French lancers and dragoons at Quatre-Bras, is a capital specimen of the illustrative sketch, where spirit and vigorous attitudes and expressions are the chief things aimed at, and every feature is appropriate and well conceived. On the other hand, homogeneity and simplicity are lacking, and, as a picture, the work does not rise far above the level of the illustrated newspaper. Yet Mr. Wollen was made for better things.—Not so Mr. R. C. Woodville, whose Badajos, 1812 (441), is exactly what we look for in cheap woodcuts. Wellington, a stiff and flat figure, is much too old for the Wellington of 1812. The best part of the picture is to be found in some of the soldiers' faces, but even these are mediocre.—If any of the military pictures in this exhibition is more trivial than 'Badajos' it is Mr. S. Lucas's Call to Arms (467), one of the most conspicuous paintings in Gallery VII. A weak and elaborate commonplace, painted without spirit, and designed in a hackneyed sort of way, it reminds us of a set-piece at the end of a play, where every walking gentleman does his best to seem to be serious. The sheriff and his companions are exactly like the supers of a transpontine stage; the bystanders pose themselves with painful insincerity and lack of spirit.—Threading the Needle, by Mr. A. Neuhuys (511), a woman tailor at work, is homely, soft, and rich in colour. In other respects it is a fairly fortunate combination of the sentiment and technique of M. Israëls and E. Frère.—In Oil for the Light (522), by Mr. F. W. W. Topham, and The Disciple (527), by Mr. W. C. Horsley, we have two pictures, each of which is weak and sentimental, but it depends upon the mood of a critic who cares to look at them long enough which of the pair he will consider the more devoid of spirit and artistic purpose. The best piece of painting in them is Mr. Horsley's head of a boy. In this, however, there is a touch of pious sentimentality which assures to it the palm of fatuity.—There is no sentimentality about Mr. F. Bramley's By the Light of the Fire (539), which comprises a woman most curiously formed and an entirely formless baby. In respect to its chiaroscuro and tonality this is a picture of merit and clever so far as it goes, which is a good way towards the achievement of the commonplace on very easy terms. A much better picture is the very rough and heavily handled sketch which Mr. Bramley calls Autumn (553), an old white horse in the autumn of its labours, painfully trudging along in the twilight. It is most pathetic, an admirable quality, though pathos does not make a picture, and is not peculiar to works of art. We suppose the subject—an actual incident probably—suggested the title, and we are sure it would have been a better picture but for the hot and impossible shadows and the floods of paint which deform it.

A sort of confectionery piece is Mrs. H. Rae's Psyche before the Throne of Venus (564). Most thinly painted and meretricious, from the point of view of art, are the nymphs and goddesses of this large and very pretty picture. Mrs. Rae's close sympathy with the art of Sir F. Leighton amounts in this picture to satire on the President. Superficial as it is, we fail not to be surprised at finding that here nymphs and goddesses resemble ballet girls, while Venus's court is like an opera scene.—Mr. Hitchcock's Mary at the House of Elizabeth (577) is disappointing. It has more in it of Bastien-Lepage than sound art; a confused composition and lack of solidity mar its merits as a piece of colour and study of open bright daylight upon the empty and unsympathetic face and form of the very Flemish young woman who sat for Mary.—Even as it is, the large size of this picture justifies itself better than its neighbour, Mr. La Thangue's Song of a Lark and the Blind Girl (596), upon the monstrous size of which we commented the other day, without mentioning, as we ought to have done, that the intense ugliness of the work is partly redeemed by the vivacity of the figures of two children standing in sunlight and watching the lark in its upward flight.—Three plump and rosy children, the subject of Mr. M. S. Lucas's oddly named Types of English Beauty (623), are pretty and spirited enough to be worth painting. The artist has never done so well before.—The chief defects of Mr. Hitchcock's, Mr. La Thangue's, and Mr. Lucas's pictures are want of technical refinement, beauty, and harmony, and in all these points they may profit by looking carefully at Mrs. Alma Tadema's Silent Persuasion (627). The soft and pearly interior light, the breadth of light and shade, the choiceness of the handling throughout, and other refinements of the artist's technique impart charms to this excellent piece of genre that we cannot find in 'The Song of a Lark,' which is thirty times its size, and is painted with a heavy hand in the crudest manner. There is, withal, more study, feeling for grace, and sympathy with character in the grouped hands of Mrs. Tadema's lovers, to say nothing of anything else, than in all the three more than half-life-size figures of the huge and unrefined No. 596.—In our opening notice we omitted to admire the high artistic qualities of Sir F. Leighton's head of a pretty little Italian model called At the Window (652), which is hung in Gallery IX. The child is leaning with folded arms upon a window-sill; her blue dress affords excellent colour by the side of the clear rosy and olive tints of her flesh. These pure and deep-toned tints are distinguished by that wealth of under-painting which is hardly ever recognized, or at least seldom aimed at, by artists of Mr. La Thangue's calibre; it is so possibly because they involve studies of an exacting nature, a cultured touch, and a fine eye.—A well-painted head of A Vagabond (635), by Mr. R. L. Owtram, is evidently a portrait of a model executed in a life school.

Mr. J. Clark, the Nestor almost of the domestic genre painters of our time, is still nearly at his best in First Steps (692), a cottage interior, where a little child is being taught to walk. This work represents the artist adequately—better, indeed, than his pleasing and sound portraits of Beatrice and Gladys, Daughters of F. Kell, Esq. (557), in Gallery VIII.—Careful, neat, and solid, but rather hard and thinly painted, is Miss J. Hayllar's A Little Better (734), a nicely drawn and well-finished group of children at a fireplace; the truth of the effect is noteworthy and commendable.—A capital piece of art, broad, clear, soft, full of colour, and homogeneous in every respect, is Mr. W. F. Calderon's Reigate Heath Cattle Fair (741), a truthful representation of men and cattle grouped with skill under a telling effect of rainy daylight.—By the Sea (731), a company of girls in bathing dresses frolicking upon the sands while the blustering wind blows their garments about, reminds us that Mr. E. M. Hale painted the same thing in a different way; but he had better not do it again, despite the spirit, movement, freshness, and pretty colour of both the examples. His Bathers (704) is nearly as good, but we care less for Out of the Depths (720).—Perhaps the most "audacious" picture in the Academy is Mr. G. Harcourt's Psyche, "Farewell!" (781) an exceedingly funny illustration of Mr. W. Morris's version of the legend according to which Cupid's mistress threw herself into a pond. Had the Hanging Committee possessed an adequate sense of humour or the least desire to make the exhibition amusing, they would have placed this stark-naked, life-size figure of a damsel whose red hair stands out in tresses radially from her face, where Mrs. Rae's version of Psyche's career (564) now hangs conspicuous. The laboriously painted young model who takes the part of Psyche stands erect with her arms extended at full above her head, as if she were about to cast herself into the blue pond at her feet, while behind her the landscape background rises like a tapestry stretched upon a wall. The design, if such it can be called, is singularly weak, while the technique of the picture cannot be fairly studied while the canvas hangs so high. Such being the case, we can only say that, apart from the luminosity and vivid coloration of the whole, the outlining of the almost transparent nudity, which is painted en silhouette before us, seems to be careful and studied to a degree that promises well for the future of the artist, who is a stranger to us, and that, when he sees the absurdity of this comical effort of his, and is content to employ himself upon canvases of moderate dimensions, there will be a great deal to be said in his favour. At present his position ought to be that of President of the New English Art Club, but it is not likely that that body would elect a man who can draw and is partial to a clean palette.—Far removed from 'Psyche' is Mr. E. A. Abbey's Fiammetta's Song (797), a brilliant and beautiful piece of romance in painting, although the figures are extremely disproportioned, and, as a whole, charming from its grace, colour, tonality, and keeping. Mr. Abbey, whose fine sense of colour, silvery hues, and harmonies of tone we have admired before, has never produced a choicer work than this, in which the elegance of the figures, their graceful attitudes, and the gracious air which pervades the design are much to be admired. On the other hand, the extravagance of the disproportions jars upon the critic's eye and offends his taste. As a harmony of brilliance in colour and lighting the whole exhibition contains nothing better than this, and very few things so good.

Mr. D. A. Wehrschmidt's Portrait of a Hay-maker (801) is painted in a solid and masculine manner, but with a somewhat heavy hand.—Besides other good elements, Mr. J. A. Lomax's Rooster (806) contains a spirited figure of a young gambler discovering his ruin. It is crisply painted throughout.—One of the least unfortunate of the unreasonably large canvases which the Selecting Committee have not rejected is Mr. G. King's painful, not to say shocking piece of prose called Thrown (834), which depicts a nearly life-size figure of a lady in a riding habit lying prone upon the side of a stony hill, apparently killed by fracturing her skull. A dog and a mounted huntsman approach. It is difficult to say why an artist who drew so well the prostrate figure and the eager, half-frightened hound, and painted with so much veracity the effect of open daylight, chose so distressing a theme. Could he imagine that any one would live with such a scene constantly before his eyes, or pay a round sum for the privilege of doing so? Deftly and cleverly painted as 'Thrown' is

Mr. King's want of sympathy and taste is, even in these sensation-loving days, startling. — Longfellow's sentimentalities have attracted more than usual attention during the past year; witness the number of pseudo-pathetic pictures like Mr. E. B. Johnson's Evangeline finding Gabriel (820), where the pining heroine discovers her lover on his death-bed. To artists like Mr. King and Mr. Johnson it never seems to occur that, while they need not paint dead ladies and dying heroes for their own delectation, purchasers for subjects of the kind are likely to be scarce. — Very crude, coarsely painted, and heavy in all respects are The Love Potion (829) and Cateran's Courtship (830) of Mr. L. Bogle, in which the artist, who has done much better, has given himself away. — In Neighbours (832) Mr. H. P. Dolman has introduced some good figures; the interior light is pleasing and silvery. — The First Communion (833), by Miss F. M. Reid, comprises some brilliant, though spotty painting of figures and old houses, while in No. 803, Summer, Mr. G. King has produced a clever study of light and tone (entirely French in character) of a lady with a red umbrella walking in a sun-flecked glade. — Mr. S. P. Cockerell's Lady Macbeth (865), a capital design, has much of the force of the tragedy, such as we do not often see. The queen, who is dressed in red, is a well-painted figure. Her hands are too small.

Mr. L. J. Pott, who has hitherto mostly painted sentimental and humorous genre, deserted his vocation when he attempted tragedy in Sanctuary: Incident in the Childhood of Peter the Great (876). His figures are nearly as commonplace as those of Mr. S. Lucas's 'Call to Arms' (467); indeed, Mr. Pott never before painted so badly as in the present instance. — The Oranges (906) of Mr. F. Brangwyn greatly disappoints us; it is a far too large picture of an orange booth in the market at Jaffa. It would, no doubt, be a good subject for a skilled painter of intense colours and a very luminous effect; but Mr. Brangwyn's haste has ruined his chances of distinction, for his picture is very rough, not to say coarsely painted, while his colours are neither too pure nor too brilliant. This is a subject for John Lewis, or for that brilliant and powerful Frenchman who, as we noticed in the Salon of a few years since, painted oranges upon a donkey-alant, and gained a name by it, while Mr. Brangwyn stands to lose one by his own slovenliness. — That distinguished artist M. Jan V. Chelminski is welcome here, where he exhibits Surprised Cossacks, Crimea (903), mounted figures in a snowy landscape, vivacious and cleverly executed, and A General's Escort (493), a similar subject, not quite so good, yet very cleverly treated. Our notes on the figure pictures and portraits by painters of figure pictures must conclude with Mr. A. C. Tayler's unsuccessful attempt to represent the effect of lamplight upon scarlet uniforms, officers' faces, and the splendid equipage of a mess-table, called 'Gentlemen! the Queen!' (920.) This picture is not to be compared with the best of Mr. Tayler's former works, where he showed conspicuous skill (and skill of a high quality) in painting interior and reflected light, sparkling objects, and white tablecloths. The figures lack animation, the faces are far from lifelike, the actions are stiff, and we fail to see why all the red coats, placed so differently as regards the light, are nearly uniformly red. Again, the carnations are adust and too much alike, and the chiaroscuro of the whole, if it can be said to exist, has not the assistance of colours duly differentiated and tones consistent with the circumstances. Of effect, in the ordinary sense of the term, there is little. In a room illuminated, as this one is supposed to be, from many points, we could not look for strong contrasts of light and shade, but it would ensure brilliancy of light, qualify the scarlets in a very difficult and subtle manner, and make the scene a field of vividness and luminous colours.

Our next article will deal with the remaining portraits and landscapes at Burlington House.

HAZLITT AND NORTHCOTE.

May 19, 1894.

IN consequence of the very full and valuable review with which you honoured my edition of Hazlitt's 'Conversations of James Northcote' on the 5th inst., Mr. Harry Goodwin has been so obliging as to lend me an interesting copy of the original of 1830, which was in the possession of Abraham Raimbach, the engraver, and then in that of his son, David Wilkie Raimbach. Abraham Raimbach was the immediate contemporary of Northcote, whom he survived until 1843. In Mr. Goodwin's volume a great many of the blank spaces which occur so incessantly in Hazlitt's text are filled up, in pencil, in what is doubtless the hand of Abraham Raimbach. These identifications cannot be absolutely relied upon, but they have, of course, very great value. I am gratified to find that, on the whole, they support my own conjectures. In several instances they confirm the suggestions of your reviewer, where he supplements my identifications. For instance, Raimbach fills up "Y— the actor" as Young, "Jack T—" as Taylor, and "Lord G." as Grosvenor.

A few instances where Raimbach throws light on difficulties which had foiled me, and which your reviewer also has not cleared up, may perhaps be worth recording. "Lord R. and Lord H. S—" (p. 84) are filled up as "Lord Robert and Lord Hugh Seymour." The very curious account of "X—" (p. 133), whom I was regretfully unable to identify, is cleared up as "Xenophon, Haydon"; "—" (p. 136) being "X's wife." According to Raimbach, the print-sellers whose failure interested Northcote (p. 143) were Hurst and Roberts. "Poor —" (p. 148) is Pope, the actor. On p. 173 "B—" is Bannister (not Baddeley). On pp. 180 and 202 "W—" is Wilkie (not Wilson). It was Mrs. "Brodie" (p. 184) on whom Colbott pounced. "J—" who said that Northcote "might go on painting yet" (p. 258), was Jackson. On p. 80 Raimbach fills up "Mr. P—" as Mr. Philippa. I had supposed this to be Mr. Patmore, and am not yet convinced. In the other instances I feel sure that Raimbach was right.

In these quotations the references are to the pagination of my own (1894) edition, and I hope that those readers of it who have already taken advantage of your reviewer's minute examination will favour me by adding these corrections also to the text.

EDMUND GOSSE.

THE BISHOP'S BARN, WELLS.

THE great tithe barn built by Bishop Bubwith, in the early part of the fifteenth century, described by the author of 'The Glossary of Architecture' as a very fine and perfect one, is now being dealt with in a manner much to be regretted by all who value the inheritance left to us in trust.

To make it available for some coming festival or gathering, the wide and lofty portals of the transept, facing north and south, are now being blocked up for the purpose of making the old place more comfortable, and the great oak doors, yet resting upon their original hooks, are to be closed over the bricked-up opening, so as to cover the deceit, and make it appear as if they were in actual use. The result is an architectural untruth of the most glaring character.

Sunshine, air, and daylight are therefore most carefully excluded. The old level of the floor has also been interfered with by being planked, much to the loss of the interior height.

In one of the chapters of 'The Lamp of Memory,' Mr. Ruskin has a word to say that it would be well for those who have the temporary control of our ancient buildings to consider a little more. He says:—

"They are not ours. They belong partly to those who built them, and partly to all generations of mankind who are to follow us. The dead have still their right in them; that which they laboured for, the praise of achievement or the expression of religious feeling, or whatever else it might be which in those buildings they intended to be permanent, we have no right to obliterate."

The late Louis Petit always spoke in the warmest admiration of the characteristic beauty of the monastic and episcopal barns of Somerset, all of which are to this day, save only this one, used for their original purpose. C.

Fine-Art Society.

TO-DAY (Saturday) is appointed for the private view of a collection of art-bronzes, including reductions, from recent Salons, at the galleries of Messrs. Bellman, Ivey & Carter, in New Bond Street. On Monday the public will be admitted. The same dates apply to the exhibition of Messrs. Obach's gathering of modern French and Dutch pictures, which is at 20, Cockspur Street. Mr. Mendoza exhibits at the St. James's Gallery, King Street, St. James's, M. L. Taxen's picture of the marriage of the Duke and Duchess of York; and the Berlin Photographic Company's photo-engravings after Rembrandt will be on view at 133, New Bond Street. Mr. Larkin invites visitors to look at a Hobbeens and other Dutch pictures.

MR. POYNTER is to be congratulated on the merit and desirableness of his first purchase, for 420 guineas, of a picture for the National Gallery, being the life-size, three-quarters-length portrait (with the arms folded upon the breast, seated and leaning back in a chair) of Romney as painted by himself, and engraved by Thomas Wright as the frontispiece of the Rev. John Romney's 'Memoirs,' 1830. The head only is nearly finished, the rest of the figure being sketched in. Painted in 1782, its incomplete condition doubtless precluded its being exhibited until the painter's son lent it to the British Institution in 1862, and, again, to the National Portrait Exhibition in 1867. At the same sale the highly interesting manuscripts, including account-books and a sort of journal of travel, were sold. Most of the valuable biographical matter in these documents has been printed in the above-named 'Memoirs'; the details of portraits by the painter and the prices received for them are curious, but the Rev. J. Romney's book supplies a sort of digest of the account-books as well as of the correspondence.

AT the sale of Madox Brown's effects, which occurred this week, the artist's noble cartoon of 'The Body of Harold brought to the Conqueror,' which held a distinguished place in the Westminster Hall competition half a century ago, was purchased out of the funds subscribed, as our readers know, for a similar purpose, and will be presented to a public gallery in London. The Art Gallery at Liverpool has secured another very fine cartoon by him.

THE next exhibition at the Fine-Art Society will consist of the original drawings and sketches by Mr. G. H. Boughton for that artist's illustrations to Washington Irving's 'Rip Van Winkle' and 'The Legend of Sleepy Hollow,' the last addition to the "Christmas Series" published by Messrs. Macmillan. The majority of Mr. Boughton's drawings are in water colour. There will also be some of the original sketches of illustrations to the artist's own stories. The private view will take place on Saturday, June 9th.

THE tenth annual exhibition of the Home Arts and Industries Association will be held in the Albert Hall on June 28th. It will remain open till Monday, July 2nd.

AT a general assembly of Academicians and Associates held on Monday evening Mr. Valentino C. Prinsep, Associate, was elected an Academician.

MR. LOWES DICKINSON has just finished a fine and expressive portrait of that distinguished Rugbyman Mr. Charles Oswell, the latest addition to the series of portraits of "old boys" to which we have already alluded. It is a life-size bust in full face, distinct, with a grey beard cut short, deep blue eyes, and a small wide-awake set obliquely on the side of the head. It will be placed in the New Big School at Rugby on the 23rd inst., when Judge Hughes will address the boys. The same artist has just completed for the same series (which will be further extended as opportunities arise) a portrait of Dean Stanley, the face being in profile to our right, in the act of poring over a volume which rests against a desk. All these portraits are admirable likenesses, so that there could not be better records of the worthies of Rugby.

WE believe that not even Fortuny, who gloried in possessing that magnificent vase of the Alhambra, as it is called, which is the masterpiece of Hispano-Maureque pottery with the metallic reflet, ever gave anything like such a sum as 19,500 fr. for a specimen of his much-adored ware. This price is reported by the Chronique des Arts to have been given at the Hôtel Drouot, on the 8th ult., for an azulejo of the fourteenth century; it is enriched with birds and escutcheons of the kings of Granada. A similar basin of Valencian craftsmanship, with figures of females, flowers, and decorative inscriptions in Arabic letters, fetched 7,300 francs. A picture by Corot, called 'Fontainebleau,' was sold for 30,200 fr., and a De Neuville, named 'Le Four à Chaux,' realized 49,100 fr.

THE congress of the Société Archéologique has been taking place at Saintes this week. On Sunday there will be a meeting at Rochelle, and on Monday or Tuesday the Ile de Ré is to be visited.

THE church of St. Michael at Lulithgow—finest of the collegiate buildings in Scotland, and closely associated with the Stuart kings—is in serious danger at the hands of the restorer, who, it is ominously reported, proposes to erect an incongruous addition to the structure that is certainly unnecessary.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

QUEEN'S HALL.—Philharmonic Concerts. Mr. Kube's Jubilee Concert. Borneo Liedertafel Concert.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Mr. Moberly's Orchestral Concert.

TO the great regret of his many English admirers, the gifted Scandinavian musician Edvard Grieg ceased his annual visits to this country some years since, and his re-appearance at a Philharmonic Concert on Thursday last week was, therefore, warmly welcomed. He was represented by three movements written for Bjørnson's play 'Sigurd Jorsalfar.' It is a gloomy drama, but the music performed on this occasion is as piquant and genial as anything Grieg has penned. The pieces are denominated Vorspiel, Intermezzo, and "Huldigungs-marsch," and it has been justly said that they are worthy to compare with the 'Peer Gynt' suites. The Vorspiel at once proclaims the individuality of the composer by its strong and persistent rhythm; and the second movement, intended to illustrate an unhappy dream of the heroine, may compare in its effects with muted strings with "Aase's Tod." Curiously enough the "Homage March" commences with a theme for the violoncellos, but gradually the rest of the orchestra enter, and the movement is worked up to an imposing climax. It is scarcely needful to add that Grieg's orchestration is picturesque and masterly, and under the composer's direction the performance may be described as perfect. Two other items in the programme were marked first time in England. These were a Fantaisie de Concert in c by Tchaikowsky, and another Fantaisie in r minor and major by Madame Sophie Menter. Both are for pianoforte and orchestra, and the late Russian composer orchestrated the latter piece. His own consists in the original of two extended movements, but the second was omitted on this occasion, upon whose authority we do not know. The practice of giving fragments of works is growing, and it should be discouraged. The movement presented is brilliant virtuosic music, and the same may be said of Madame Menter's work, which might pass for a Liszt rhapsody. The pianoforte part in both was splendidly played as regards manipulative dexterity by Madame Menter, but the suitability of music of this class in a Philharmonic programme is a point at any rate open to argument. For the rest Dr. A. C. Mackenzie secured a refined performance of Beethoven's Symphony in r, No. 8; and Mlle. Landi was charming in airs by Gluck, Saint-Saëns, and Massenet. The concert ended with the scherzo and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's music to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' which were first played at a Philharmonic Concert in May, 1844, exactly half a century ago.

It is scarcely necessary to remind our readers of the eminent services rendered to music by Mr. Wilhelm Kuhe, whose "Jubilee" Concert was held at the Queen's Hall on Monday afternoon. Above all, it should not be forgotten that the Bohemian musician strove to establish a winter festival at Brighton, where he has laboured for many years with much success, alike as a teacher, pianist, and conductor. The festival was given from 1870 to 1882, after which it was abandoned for want of the support which should have been forthcoming from the first. But Mr. Kuhe had no reason to complain of lack of patronage at his concert on Monday, for the spacious room was well filled. The programme partook of the nature of the old-fashioned afternoon concert, when a number of artists, chiefly vocal, appeared in programmes destitute of intrinsic musical interest. Nevertheless, it should be mentioned, as proving the esteem in which Mr. Kuhe is held, that such performers as Mesdames Albani, Liza Lehmann, Dale, Esther Palliser, Sterling, Sophie Menter, Clara Butt, and Alice Gomez, and Messrs. Lloyd, Santley, Norman Salmond, David Bispham, Eugene Oudin, Simonetti, Leo Stern, and George Grosmith gave their services on the occasion.

Part-music for male voices unaccompanied is cultivated far more assiduously on the Continent than it is in this country, and the first appearance of the Berner Liedertafel Choir on Monday was an event of interest to a limited section of the public. This association consists of 120 voices, very well trained under Dr. Munzinger, and pieces by W. Baumgartner, F. Hegar, Franz Abt, Max Bruch, Silcher, and other composers were rendered with surprising vocal power, though not, perhaps, with the delicacy which we expect from English singers. The most interesting feature in the programme was a setting of a ballad by Ludwig Uhland, entitled 'Harald,' by the conductor, Dr. Munzinger, for tenor and baritone soli (carefully interpreted by Herr Max Lips and Herr Jacques Egloff) and chorus. This is a cleverly written piece, though the reminiscences of Wagner are very transparent. A highly favourable impression as a soprano vocalist was made by Frau Emma Rauber-Sandoz. A second concert by the Berner choir was announced for Friday evening, of course too late for notice this week.

The string orchestra of ladies originally organized by the Rev. E. H. Moberly, we believe at Salisbury, has steadily increased in numbers and efficiency, and the concert given in St. James's Hall on Friday last week was in every respect successful. Evidently the female players possess good instruments, for the tone produced as well as the execution was strikingly good. Mr. Moberly offered an interesting programme, commencing with a Serenade in r, Op. 16, by Mr. Emanuel Moór, said in the programme to be an Hungarian composer, but a native of Prague, which is, of course, contradictory. This is a matter of slight importance; what is of more value is to note the progress displayed by Mr. Moór in writing symmetrically, though he is still restless as regards tonality. Other items worthy of mention were a Ballade by M. Arthur de Greef, Op. 1, and Robert Fuchs's tuneful Serenade in r, Op. 9. The Test Valley Madrigal Choir was highly commendable in some unaccompanied part-music, and Miss Dale was charming in songs by Grieg, Chaminade, Stanford, and Barnby.

Musical Society.

THERE is little to note respecting the Opera at present, as only repetition performances have been given up to the time of writing, though it is understood that Sir Augustus Harris has no fewer than four novelties in rehearsal. At the second performance of 'Faust,' on Friday last week, Mlle. Nuovina, from Brussels, impersonated Marguerite with but moderate success, and the same may be said of Signor de Lucia in the titular part; but on the other hand Signorina Giulia Ravogli was the most effective Siebel we have had since the late Madame Trebboli was in her prime, and vocally Signor Ancona was an admirable Valentine. On Saturday, in 'Pagliacci,' Miss Lucille Hill sustained the rôle of Nedda with success; and in 'Cavalleria Rusticana' Signor Morello as Turiddu, and Mr. David Bispham as Alfio, played these parts for the first time at Covent Garden, each meriting warm commendation.

AFTER all there is to be a short series of operas in German at Drury Lane this season. Sir Augustus Harris proposes to produce Wagner's 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Die Walküre,' 'Siegfried,' and 'Tristan und Isolde,' and possibly 'Der Freischütz' and 'Fidelio.' The performances will be given on Tuesdays and Saturdays, probably commencing on June 10th. Herr Alvary is engaged, and Sir Augustus Harris is in negotiation with Frau Klafsky.

Or the numerous pianoforte recitals given within the past few days those of Madame Roger-Miclos at the Princes' Hall last Saturday afternoon, and Mlle. Kleeberg at St. James's Hall on Monday, were the most commendable. Favourable mention may also be made of Madame Anna Elischer, described as pianist to the Court of Holland, who gave a concert at the small Queen's Hall on Monday afternoon, and the recital of M. Raoul Pugno, from Paris, who gave the first of two recitals at the Princes' Hall on the same afternoon.

THE second concert this season of the series announced by M. Tivadar Nachéz took place last Saturday afternoon at St. James's Hall, the popular violinist playing with much effect Tartini's sonata 'Il Trillo del Diavolo,' some pieces by Bach, Max Bruch's Concerto in c minor, No. 1, Dr. Mackenzie's 'Benedictus,' and compositions from his own pen. Mr. Eugene Oudin was entirely acceptable in songs by various composers, ranging from Mensigny to Tchaikowsky.

THE benefit concert given to Mr. W. H. Eyre, who recently resigned his appointment as organist at the Crystal Palace owing to ill health, was a substantial success, the room being well filled. Many vocal and instrumental artists of high repute gave their assistance, and much enthusiasm was aroused by the performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by a very juvenile executant from Poland, named Bronislaw Hubermann, said to be under nine years of age. The lad is now studying under Herr Joachim, and has certainly the making of a great artist.

ANOTHER boy violinist of remarkable promise is Master Arthur Argiewicz, who gave a recital at the Princes' Hall on Monday evening. He played Max Bruch's Concerto in c minor, No. 1, and various smaller works with much refinement and excellence in execution. We are glad to learn that he is to be withdrawn from public life as soon as a sufficient sum has been earned to pay for his further education, and he will then be placed under Herr Joachim.

AT the concert of the Musical Guild on Tuesday evening at the Kensington Town Hall excellent performances of quartets by Haydn and Brahms were secured, the executants being Miss Maggie Moore, Miss Isabelle Donkersley, and Messrs. Hobday, Paul Ludwig, and W. Sutcliffe. Miss Ethel Thorpe played some of Brahms's recently published pianoforte pieces, Op. 118 and 119, with much intelligence.

SIGNOR SCUDERI gave his second concert at the Steinway Hall on Wednesday afternoon, and showed his versatility by playing on the violin, the guitar, and the mandolin. The songs contributed by Mr. Oscar Noyes, who is the possessor of a good baritone voice, and the pianoforte playing of Miss Annie Burghes were agreeable features of the entertainment.

THE Musical Times has just completed the fiftieth year of its existence, and has issued a "Jubilee" number containing articles of historical interest and engravings representing musical events half a century ago, also a facsimile of the first issue of the paper and an arrangement of the 'Hymn to Apollo' recently discovered at Delphi. The Hymn is to be performed at Cambridge next week. It will be first sung in Greek unaccompanied, and again, in a translation by Dr. Verrall, with modern harmonization.

ENGLISH music is not wholly unappreciated on the Continent. We learn from Wiesbaden that at the Kurhaus concerts Sir Arthur Sullivan's overture 'Di Ballo' and Mr. Edward German's Dances from 'Henry VIII.' were recently received with much applause.

DRAMA

Dramatic Society.

'TIME, HUNGER, AND THE LAW,' by Mr. Lawrence Irving, produced at an afternoon representation at the Criterion, is not without idea, but is a very evident product of inexperience. The scene is Russia, and the story deals with the betrayal by a woman of her son. Some power of characterization is shown, but the dialogue is both verbose and inflated. Among those taking part in the performance were the author, his brother Mr. H. B. Irving, Mr. Cyril Maude, and Miss Dolores Drummond.

A MISCELLANEOUS performance of farce, music, recitations, imitations, &c., was given on Tuesday afternoon for a benefit at the Lyric Theatre.

A REVIVAL of 'Our Flat' is said to be in contemplation at the Strand Theatre, which is at present closed.

THE first appearance at the Gaiety of Mlle. Réjane and the Vaudeville company is fixed for June 23rd, when M. Sardou's 'Madame Sans-Gêne' will be produced. The regular season at the house will begin on August 5th, with a revival of 'Jack Sheppard.'

SIGNORA DUNE will, it appears, make no further variation in her programme, but will confine herself to 'La Dame aux Camélias' and the mixed programme of 'La Locandiera' and 'La Cavalleria Rusticana.' The season of Madame Sarah Bernhardt at Daly's Theatre will begin on the 18th inst. with 'Izely,' a drama not yet seen in this country. 'La Femme de Claude' and 'Les Rois' are also promised.

'THE CANDIDATE,' Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy's version of 'Le Député de Bombignac' of M. Bisson, has lost little if anything of its power to amuse, and is played in a style no less brilliant than when, ten years ago at the Criterion, at which it is now revived, it first saw the light. Mr. Wyndham resumes the character of Viscount Oldacre, the candidate, and plays it with his former vivacity and aplomb. Mr. Giddons is again the Radical secretary whose unexpected vicarious victory at the Easthampton poll proves so embarrassing to his principal. Few changes have been made in the cast. Miss Mary Moore, however, as the ingénue replaces Miss Kate Rorke.

A NEW drama by Mr. Tyrone Power, entitled 'The Texan,' is promised at the Princess's, from which, happily, 'Jean Mayeux' has been withdrawn. The author will play a part in his own piece.

INDIA'S PRINCES. Short Life

Sketches of the Native Rulers of India. By Mrs. GRIFFITH.

"Something akin to Oriental splendour has been displayed in the preparation of 'India's Princes.' This volume embodies short biographical sketches of the native rulers of India. It is enriched with photographic portraits and other pictorial views, which have been very judiciously produced. To all in any way interested in our Indian Empire this handsome volume will be a source of delight and pleasure." Standard.

EPPS'S COCAINE.

COCAINE EXTRACT. (TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted ribs (broken-up bones) of the natural Cocoon, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their essence of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"COCAINE," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistency of tea, of which it is now habitually taking the place with many. Its tonic principle, being a gentle nerve-stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in Packets and Tins, labelled "JAMES EPPS & CO. ESTHER WATERS.

A Novel.

By GEORGE MOORE.

"In 'Esther Waters' a terrible picture is drawn of the demoralization of the humbler classes by betting—a picture which may sting the national conscience as no denunciation by bishops or anti-gambling leagues has ever stung it."—Times.

"From cover to cover there is not one line in 'Esther Waters' that would do an atom of harm to any pure-minded intelligent girl. That it is a 'human document' is true—far truer of this book than of the majority which claim the designation; but though the story of a poor girl's life and struggles is told with vividness and truth, there is no undue stress or prominence given to the stumblings and falls which will not cease to happen as long as human nature exists according to the present pattern designed by the Creator. On the contrary, Mr. Moore deserves considerable praise for the reticence with which he has held back from insisting upon and intensifying the shadows of his picture, a temptation to which many writers, including the great Zola, are only too willing to yield, thereby proving that the balance of true art is not yet theirs. The story that Mr. Moore has told so admirably is one that should be read by every one whose heart is large enough to sympathize with the sufferings of our fellow-creatures among whom we live. Truth and actuality are to be found in every line; as we read we seem to know more about what life means among the poor than we ever knew before. Strong, vivid, sober, yet undaunted in its realism, full to the brim of observation of life and character, 'Esther Waters' is not only immeasurably superior to anything the author has ever written before, but it is one of the most remarkable works that has appeared in print this year, and one which does credit not only to the author, but to the country in which it has been written."—World.

MAN and WOMAN: a Study of Human Secondary Sexual Characters. By HAVELOCK ELLIS.

"Enough has been said to show that Mr. Havelock Ellis's book is a most interesting one, and one that well repays careful perusal. We think it somewhat unfortunate that the author has introduced certain subjects which, in our opinion, would have been better omitted, being more suited for professional than for general discussion. But with this exception the book deserves the heartiest praise, not only for the amount of information it contains, but also for its clear and interesting style, and for the able and impartial way in which a difficult subject has been treated."—Daily Chronicle.

The EVOLUTION of MODERN CAPITALISM: a Study of Machine Production.

By JOHN A. HOBSON, M.A.

This is a scientific inquiry into the changes of industrial structure during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Opening with an examination of the structure of industry about 1730 (with special reference to England), the book traces the forces determining the application of machinery and steam-motor to the various departments of industry in the chief industrial countries, and the changes brought about in the structure and functional activity of the business, the trade, the industrial organism. Special studies are presented of the tendency of competition of large capitals to lapse into combination, and the formation of trusts and syndicates; Trade Depression in relation to methods of modern competition. The influence of Machine-production is studied in its bearing upon quantity and regularity of employment, character of labour, remuneration of labour, the employment of women. The reaction of modern conditions of work upon life is treated in relation to the industrial town, and an attempt is made to estimate the influence of modern forces in affecting a reorganization of industry and industrial life.

The THEATRICAL "WORLD" for 1893. By WILLIAM ARCHER.

"That the literary drama dealing with social problems made great advance during 1893 is universally admitted, but if proof were wanted nothing could be more conclusive than Mr. Archer's series of thoughtful and pointed articles." "A pleasure to the reader and a boon to the dramatic student."—Glasgow Herald. "As a record of the year's doings in the theatre Mr. Archer's volume stands unrivalled."—Daily News.

CLIMBING AND EXPLORATION IN THE KARAKORAM-HIMALAYAS.

By WILLIAM MARTIN CONWAY, M.A. F.S.A. F.R.G.S.

With 300 Illustrations by A. D. McCORMICK, and a Map. Is 1 vol. super-royal 8vo. 738 pp. cloth, gilt top, 31s. 6d. net.

Times.—"A splendid record of a daring and adventurous scientific expedition."

Standard.—"The lover of art for art's sake will find in the numerous illustrations some of the most beautiful transcripts from nature that have ever adorned a book of travels."

Athenæum.—"In Mr. Conway we have an observer of men—a whole heaven removed from the ordinary globe-trotter."

St. James's Gazette.—"The great charm of the book is one too seldom found in books of travel. The author is a man of science who knows the names of things, and he possesses the artistic temperament which enables him to understand and impart to others the fascination of the grandest scenery."

Saturday Review.—"We have seldom seen a volume which speaks to the eye and understanding so pleasantly and expressively on every page."

Morning Post.—"Readers of books of travel could not have a better guide to interest them in some of the grandest scenery the world affords than Mr. W. M. Conway.... The illustrations are admirably clear and graphic, and the whole appearance of the book seems all that could be desired."

Scotsman.—"Mr. Conway has done a work which places him in the first rank of the mountain climbers and ice explorers of our day."

Glasgow Herald.—"A vast mass of new information for all classes of intelligent readers, be they scientists or not."

Edward Whymper in the Daily Chronicle.—"It will long hold a chief place in the affections of those whose hearts are in the mountains."

W. A. B. Coolidge in the Pall Mall Gazette.—"The book is not merely the narrative of the best organized and most successful mountaineering expedition as yet made, it is a most valuable and minute account, based on first-hand evidence, of a most fascinating region of the heaven-scarred Himalayas."

Reginald Hughes in the Academy.—"A lucid record of an explorer's experiences, of scientific work achieved, of mountaineering difficulties surmounted, of scenes of beauty enjoyed.... It has a freshness and immediateness of impression, a plainness, lucidity and atmosphere, usually conspicuous by their absence in works of the kind."

Yorkshire Post.—"The narrative.... is full of interest, increased here and there to excitement.... The volume is magnificently illustrated, and will be read with the utmost pleasure not only by experts, but by all who care to follow deeds demanding courage and endurance, and serving at the same time the interests of science."

Birmingham Daily Post.—"Mr. Conway's undoubted tale speaks for itself of the nerve and resolution of the explorers, of whom he was the guide and captain, and his feat will long rank as one of the highest in the annals of mountaineering."

Clinton Dent in the Westminster Gazette.—"Mr. Conway's book will live, and it deserves to live, for it is a graphic record of good work done, of difficulties overcome by pluck, judgment, and determination, of adventure in an almost new country; of novel mountaineering experiences, all set forth with extreme literary skill."

Daily Telegraph.—"Perhaps no book of recent date gives a simpler, or at the same time more effective, picture of the truly wonderful mountain regions lying beyond the northern boundary of India than Mr. Conway's striking volume.... Unquestionably valuable contributions to our knowledge of the world.... Mr. Conway's narrative deserves the highest praise as the record of a brilliant and successful journey."

Daily News.—"As a history of daring and endurance, combined with unfailing resourcefulness, alert intelligence, variety of knowledge, and qualification among its members, and artistic taste, it is a production of which Mr. Conway's countrymen may be proud."

Manchester Guardian.—"This record of mountaineering on the grandest scale is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable books of its kind ever produced. What strikes us most forcibly in reading and re-reading it is the singular completeness with which the story has been told.... The illustrations are excellent, and reproduced, as they deserve to be, in the best manner."

PIERS PLOWMAN, 1363-1399: a Contribution to the History of English Mysticism. By J. J. JUSSERAND, Author of 'English Wayfaring Life, &c. Photogravure Frontispiece and 26 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 12s. Also, a FINE EDITION on Japan Paper. Demy 8vo. vellum binding, gilt lettered, 31s. net.

"M. Jusserand has once more made English literature his debtor by his admirable monograph on Piers Plowman.... It is a masterly contribution to the history of our literature, inspired by wide study and rare delicacy of critical appreciation."—Times.

"The work is marked by the felicitous insight and vivid suggestiveness that charm us in previous writings of the author.... Extremely interesting illustrations."—Saturday Review.

PROFESSOR DRUMMOND'S NEW WORK.

The Lowell Lectures

ON

THE ASCENT OF MAN.

By HENRY DRUMMOND,

Author of 'Natural Law in the Spiritual World.'

The DAILY NEWS says:—

"Readers who recollect Professor Drummond's article on mimicry in his book on Tropical Africa will expect much from his lectures on the greatest subject in evolution—the 'ascent' of man. Nor will they be disappointed. No less conspicuous are Professor Drummond's powers of illustration. Without being at all superficial, his book is one of the simplest and most popular ever written. He is one of the few who can make a complex scientific subject clear to any ordinary capacity, and attractive to anybody with a glimmer of imagination."

Now ready, 8vo. cloth, 12s. with 6 Maps specially prepared.

PROFESSOR GEORGE ADAM SMITH'S

HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, Paternoster-row.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS.

THIRD EDITION.

E. F. Benson.—THE RUBICON. By E. F. BENSON, Author of 'Dodo.' 2 vols.

Crown 8vo. 21s.

"The anticipations which must have been formed by all readers of 'Dodo' will in nowise be disappointed by 'The Rubicon.' The new work is well written, stimulating, unconventional, and, in a word, characteristic. Intellectual force is never absent, and the keen observation and knowledge of character of which there is abundant evidence are aided by real literary power."—Birmingham Post.

"We congratulate Mr. Benson upon an exceptional achievement. He has conceived and executed successfully an analytical study of modern life in which a certain salt of humour serves, at least, to keep the pages wholesome. The book is a notable advance upon Mr. Benson's previous work."—Natural Observer.

"Mr. Benson's very clever and deeply interesting novel—a novel far superior to 'Dodo.'—Sussex Daily News.

"Mr. Benson's second novel is better artistically than his first. The character-drawing is excellent."—Globe.

Baring-Gould.—THE QUEEN OF LOVE. By S. BARING-GOULD, Author of

'Mehalah,' 'Cheap-Jack Zita,' &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

"The scenery is admirable and the dramatic incidents are most striking."—Glasgow Herald.

"Strong, interesting, and clever."—Westminster Gazette.

"The characters have the individuality which stamps Mr. Baring-Gould's works."—Speaker.

"You cannot put it down until you have finished it."—Evening News.

"Can be heartily recommended to all who care for cleanly, energetic, and interesting fiction."—Sussex News.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

Stanley Weyman.—UNDER THE RED ROBE. By STANLEY WEYMAN,

Author of 'A Gentleman of France,' &c. With 12 Illustrations by R. Calton Woodville. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.

"A book of which we have read every word for the sheer pleasure of reading, and which we put down with a pang that we cannot forget it all and start again. It is, indeed, a most ingenious and excellent story, written with that care and unflinching sense of style which we have grown to expect from this writer."—Westminster Gazette.

"An extremely attractive and well-written story, which enchains one's interest from beginning to end. A genuine romance."—Daily Telegraph.

"Everybody who reads books at all must read this thrilling romance. From the first page to the last the breathless reader is held along. The book is an inspiration of manliness and courage."—Daily Chronicle.

"The dramatic episodes of the story are described with masterly skill, and the days of Richelieu live again in these vivid pages. A story which no lover of good fiction ought to miss."—Speaker.

"Mr. Stanley Weyman has in this the real thing, the incommunicable magical thing which we call genius. It is the vigour and imaginative force of the whole conception and of the individual scenes which strike one most."

"The most thrilling romance the author has yet written."—Morning Post.

"There are a vigour, a freshness, and a breezy sanity in this book which are as welcome as they are rare in the fiction of the day."—St. James's Gazette.

"Quite remarkable for force of writing and vivid picturesqueness. Every character stands out with distinct personality."—Guardian.

"A piece of pure romance, which, for sheer adventure, absorbing incident, the clash of passion, and the thrill of fight—and, above all, for its fine strong human note, and its bold incentive to loyalty and pluck—at once claims a place beside the best that our day, or our fathers' day, has seen."—Today.

Mrs. Oliphant.—THE PRODIGALS. By MRS. OLIPHANT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.

"An excellently constructed story."—Daily Telegraph.

"Written with the art of a practised hand. There is force and pathos through the book, which is a very deft and distinguished piece of work."—Daily News.

"The book is very good reading. The characters are drawn with the vigour and truth of studies from life."

St. James's Gazette.

"The Prodigal" is a novel that may be praised cordially and without reserve, and it is still more a novel to be enjoyed."

Woman.

Richard Pryce.—WINIFRED MOUNT. By RICHARD PRYCE, Author of 'Miss

Maxwell's Affections,' 'Time and the Woman,' &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.

"A delightful story. The writing is uniformly bright and graceful, and the sketches of fashionable life are exceedingly well done."—Sussex News.

"Mr. Richard Pryce is a deft and elegant story-teller, gifted with a lively imagination, a sprightly humour, and a keen insight into the intricacies of human character. He possesses, moreover, constructive ability of no mean order, and the plots of his refreshingly unadorned romances, though slight in substance, are symmetrical in form. All these good qualities are agreeably exemplified in his new novel. An extremely clever story, utterly unalloyed by pessimism or vulgarity."—Daily Telegraph.

"A very entertaining and well-written novel of society."—Birmingham Post.

Constance Smith.—A CUMBERBEE OF THE GROUND. By CONSTANCE

SMITH, Author of 'The Riddle of Lawrence Haviland.' 3 vols. crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

"A distinctly clever novel. Most people who take up the novel will go right through it at a sitting. The author has humour too."—Glasgow Herald.

"An excellent story, in which a great ethical lesson is skilfully worked out without being obtruded. A story that holds the attention engrossed, and leaves behind an impression of power and insight."—Northman.

Gilbert Parker.—THE TRANSLATION OF A SAVAGE. By GILBERT PARKER,

Author of 'Pierre and his People,' 'Mrs. Falschion,' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"The plot is original and one difficult to work out. But Mr. Parker has done it with great skill and delicacy. The reader who is not interested in this original, fresh, and well-told tale must be a dull person indeed."—Daily Chronicle.

"A strong and successful piece of workmanship. The portrait of Lail, strong, dignified, and pure, is exceptionally well drawn."—Manchester Guardian.

"A very pretty and interesting story, and Mr. Parker tells it with much skill. The story is one to be read."

St. James's Gazette.

Flinders Petrie.—TELL EL AMARNA. By W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE, D.C.L.

History of Cabinets: from the Union with Scotland to the Acquisition of Canada and Bengal. By W. M. TORRENS. 2 vols. (Allen & Co.)

THIS is, perhaps, the most important of the books written by the late Mr. Torrens, the result of seven years' "ceaseless labour bestowed upon it," as we are told, and marked by the shrewdness and political insight of which he had given abundant proof in his earlier volumes and in his public life. But it is unfortunate that he should have delayed the writing of it till he had long passed his prime, and that he only lived long enough to complete half of the task he had undertaken. The "crudities and small blunders which he would have remedied had his sight allowed him," and for which his amanuensis apologizes, may be readily excused; and there is nothing to wonder at in the more serious faults of his work, seeing that before he started on it he was more than seventy, and was no longer able to either read or write with ease. These faults, however, materially lessen the value of the book.

The title is misleading. Mr. Torrens's main intention was evidently to trace throughout the reigns of George I. and George II. the development of the Cabinet Council as a machinery for the management of English affairs by a body of ministers responsible to Parliament as well as to the Crown, and more or less bound by one another's proceedings; but he has not done this at all completely, and a large part of the interesting information here brought together—much of it from contemporary manuscripts—has very little connexion with his special subject. It is, in fact, a gossiping contribution to the political history of England between 1714 and 1760, with an introductory chapter about the previous quarter of a century, rather than a "history of Cabinets," which Mr. Torrens has bequeathed to us; and the student who consults his volumes for light on their avowed theme must grope through more than 1,100 closely-printed pages, of which less than 100 will serve his purpose, and which are furnished with no table of contents and with a very inadequate index.

In Mr. Torrens's view "the first Cabinet" was formed in England in 1714, with Townshend, then principal Secretary of State, as its acknowledged head, and with Marlborough and Archbishop Tenison as two of its sixteen members; and there can be no doubt that this junto was much more akin to our modern institution than any of its predecessors. The Elector George knew nothing of English political arrangements, and cared little about them, when he heard that he was to inherit the crown from his distant cousin Anne, and all the conditions and circumstances of his promotion tended to make him much less of an autocrat than any of the Stuarts, or even William of Orange, had been or had aspired to be. "William would ask no man to form a Government for him, for he wanted Ministers, not a Ministry," says Mr. Torrens; and there is substantial truth in his remark that "no group or body of advisers deserving that distinctive appellation [of Cabinet] is recognisable in the reign of William or of Anne. Neither during the interregnum, when the transfer of the Crown [from James II. to William and Mary] was pending, nor after its legislative disposal, was there any effective combination of influential men in office capable of exercising the duties and responsibilities of executive rule."

But there were germs of a Cabinet Council long before the Revolution. Trenchard, writing about 1698, complained that, whereas "formerly all matters of state and discretion were debated and resolved in the Privy Council," Charles II. "broke this most excellent part of our Constitution by settling a Cabal or Cabinet Council, where all matters of consequence were debated and resolved, and then brought to the Privy Council to be confirmed"; and although, in the discussion that ensued, Lord Cowper said the term was "of uncertain significance" and "unknown to our law," the Earl of Seaford called the attention of the House of Lords in 1711 to the fact that "the design of an offensive war in Spain was approved and directed by the Cabinet Council." The Cabinet of 1714 was only, in somewhat more systematic shape and with steadier authority, a grouping of ministers of the same sort as had frequently occurred during the preceding half century. Nor was it much more than an irregularly appointed committee of the Privy Council. Though Townshend was at first its real chief, the nominal head—never present, it would seem, at its meetings at the Cockpit—was Marlborough; and Tenison was not the only other member whose share in the proceedings was but formal. All through the following fifty years, indeed, while the principle of Cabinet government was advancing by fits and starts, the Cabinet continued to be practically a Cabal, of which individual members were changed, generally a few at a time, and in which, though it was controlled through one long spell by a statesman as masterful as Walpole, and through another by the elder Pitt, there was no Prime Minister so called and formally recognized until the nondescript and varying supremacy of the Whigs under George II. gave place to Tory subserviency to the Crown under George III.

Copious as are the details already printed of the political history of England in the days of Walpole and the elder Pitt, Mr. Torrens's diligent search among the manuscripts in the Record Office, the British Museum, and other collections has brought much fresh matter, both amusing and instructive, to light. His restatement of comparatively familiar items, moreover, is generally welcome. He supplies, for instance, a most precise account of the services rendered to Sunderland and the Whig party, with more profit than credit to themselves, by Addison, Steele, Defoe, and other men of letters. Addison, it will be remembered, resigned the Secretaryship of State in 1718, when he wrote to Swift saying that, "God be thanked, he was entirely free both of his office and his asthma." A worse man took his place:—

"Duchess Sarah, who, with all her pride and love of magnificence, had in her a more genuine and courageous sympathy with talent than all the dilettante patrons of art and letters of her time, bade Sunderland take young Craggs, who was among her favourites, and make him Addison's successor. He was the son of a land steward, and had had, as a boy, but an indifferent education. But he was undoubtedly possessed of considerable abilities, and a rare tact and suavity of manner, by which he rose rapidly in the world. He was one of the singular men of whom it may be said their deficiencies have floated them upwards. Sarah had sent him to Oxford, but even she could not make him read. He brought away with him a degree and a little scholarship; and even those who wished to thrust him forward with a view to use him could not pretend that he was well informed. But he had the gaiety of temper that consoled him in all failures, the elasticity of spirits whereof his betters were frequently in want. A keen critic long afterwards described him as one who, by perseverance and exercise, from a very bad became a very good speaker. He had no foundation of literature, and yet he had a happy knack in turning phrases, which few of his superiors equalled; and being a man of pleasure it was not to be supposed he could have had much time for solid improvement. 'No one ever exceeded him in the management of many sour and perverse Members. He attended their clubs, and by his songs and jollity put them into, and kept them in, good humour. He was successful in making himself agreeable, and in making himself esteemed and beloved beyond any man in his disadvantageous circumstances. On the other hand, he was said not to have been a good speaker, and reproached for speaking from the insolence of office, and that if reduced to private life he would have made but a poor figure in Parliament. To great vivacity, assurance, and good luck his surprising exaltation was to be imputed.' To which old Horace of Woolterton, who knew him well, rejoined, 'As a Minister he had no scheme or principle calculated for the service of his country; but, like a true disciple of Sunderland, his views and actions had no other tendency, right or wrong, but that of making himself appear great and considerable.'"

Mr. Torrens's book does not pretend to be a full and comprehensive chronicle or review of the reigns of George I. and George II., and some of his references to military and other affairs are too brief to be clear to readers not well acquainted with the period; but his account of the tricks by which Sunderland, Walpole, and their hangers-on, rivals, and successors played their dishonest game is intelligible enough. Fortunately, most of them were patriots to some extent, and they benefited as well as corrupted the nation. Under the first two Georges the Divine Right of Kings theory was too thoroughly demolished for the third George's attempt to revive it to be of any avail, and though Parliament was still merely a tool in the hands of a greedy oligarchy, the despots led the way to popular freedom. There was a characteristic interview between George II. and Lord Chancellor Hardwicke in January, 1745, shortly after a reconstruction of the Cabinet in the transition stage between Walpole's leadership and Pitt's:—

"George II. made no effort to conceal his chagrin at having been compelled to abandon those whom he liked best and trusted most. His demeanour towards the Ministry was so cold and reserved as to attract observation, and their uneasiness increased day by day. Before the Christmas holidays expired, Hardwicke asked an audience, and undertook to read his Majesty a lecture on his past conduct, and to admonish him as to what it should be in future. The King received him standing, and during the interview said little. It began with deferential expressions of desire to know the Royal pleasure, and of concern at the critical position of affairs. If those who had gone out had represented the readjusted Cabinet as opposed to the vigorous prosecution of the war, they had greatly belied them. Far from such being the case, Ministers were ready to call on Parliament for a renewed subsidy to the Queen of Hungary, who would engage the services of the Hanoverians for the preservation of the Electorate; and in addition to take thirty thousand Russians into pay: in short, everything ought and would be done to prosecute the war with vigour. But for this, something more was indispensable than the mere grants of money from a manageable Parliament. The King interrupted him: 'I have done all you asked of me. I have put all power into your hands, and I suppose you will make the most of it.' The Chancellor rejoined: 'This disposition of places is not enough if your Majesty takes pains to show the world that you disapprove of your own work.' The King: 'My work! I was forced; I was threatened.' The Chancellor: 'I am sorry to hear your Majesty use those expressions. I know of no force; I know of no threats. No means were used but what have been used in all times, the humble advice of your servants, supported by such reasons as convinced them that the measure was necessary for your service.' The King: 'Yes, I was told that I should be opposed.' The Chancellor: 'Never by me, sir; nor by any of my friends. How others might represent us I do not pretend to know.' He then proceeded to dilate on the advantage which a Coalition of the heads of parties gave if it were properly used, not only in carrying legislative measures, but in exercising a freer choice between candidates for Administrative office; and, trying what a stroke of flattery might do, he added: 'Your Ministers, sir, are only your instruments of government.' This was too much for Royal patience. The King smiled and said bitterly, 'Ministers are the King in this country.'"

Ten years later a message was sent to King George, who had been for a long time living in Hanover, to urge the importance of his presence in the country of which he was king:—

"'There are Kings enough,' he said, 'in England. I am nothing there. I am old, and want rest, and should only go to be plagued and teased there about that d—d House of Commons, &c.'"

Mr. Torrens deals much more kindly with Walpole, who is the central figure in his first volume, than with the older Pitt, whose gradual rise to power, in spite of jealous rivalries and royal aversion, is the main theme of the second.

My Paris Note-Book. By the Author of 'An Englishman in Paris.' (Heinemann.)

THE author of that impudent, though rather amusing compilation, 'An Englishman in Paris,' has constructed another collection of anecdotes and sketches on a different principle. It will be remembered that the Athenæum was the first to expose the device used to induce the public to buy the former work. The untruthful suggestion that it was from the pen of Sir Richard Wallace was effected by the insertion, in the pretended narrative of the author's life, of incidents which could only belong to that of Sir Richard. M. Charles Yriarte, the confidential friend of the owner of Bagatelle and Hertford House, had his attention called by the Athenæum to the mystification, and in Paris publicly corroborated the exposure; but that did not prevent the author from subsequently repeating, in the advertisement of the French translation of the work, that it was attributed to Sir Richard Wallace. In the volume before us the author makes no reference to his former fiction, coolly remarking that "the rough notes that constituted the foundation of 'An Englishman in Paris' were given to him by M. de Maupas, but were so manipulated by him that "if, after that, I am not the author of the book, Stephenson is not the inventor of the locomotive, for he did not make his own material any more than I did." A writer who has to resort to these shifts in order to sell his books is not likely to be capable of producing high-class literary work, and we are not sorry that England cannot claim for her own this ingenious craftsman, while we protest against the suggestion on the title-page of the new volume that the scurrilous references made in it to living persons are from the pen of "an Englishman."

In the 'Note-Book' the writer makes two of his uncles responsible for the more ancient stories. These aged Dutchmen were, it appears, on terms of close intimacy with Napoleon III.; and if the Emperor had many such intimates and was in the habit of relating to them equally lengthy anecdotes, we can understand how it was he had no time to attend to his army and to European affairs, and how the end was Sedan and the downfall of his dynasty. This evidently was the case, as if Louis Napoleon were the original repository of these narratives, he had already spent much time in relating them to the compilers of other anecdotal works, such as the 'Correspondance de Fouché,' where the Journal des Débats has discovered several of these venerable stories which the author of the 'Note-Book' would have his readers believe are revelations. To do him justice, he imparts a quality to them not conspicuous in the originals, that of tediousness. He, however, glories in his powers of spinning out, and confesses that the notes on which he founded the two stout volumes of 'An Englishman in Paris' "barely covered three quires of note-paper." In this volume a chapter of sixteen pages, devoted to reminiscences of Victor Emmanuel, might be compressed into six without the omission of a single incident. The stories relate chiefly to the Contessa di Mirafiori; but as they contain nothing about "La Bella Rosina," not familiar to all who have studied the domestic history of the king, they can only have been dragged into a 'Paris Note-Book' for the useful purpose of padding. This is not the most flagrant instance in the book: towards the end the author, presumably not having enough "Note-Book" for the requisite number of pages, fills two of them with the genealogy of Marshal MacMahon, taken bodily from a Parisian newspaper which published it at the time of his death last October.

The most readable parts of the book are the author's own journalistic notes on contemporary French political life, but they are so little up to date that some of the chapters read like old magazine articles badly revised. Near the beginning of those entitled "Round about the Palais Bourbon," he goes out of his way to add a note that they were "written in February, 1894," and this portion of the book ends with a lament on the lack of orators "in the present Chamber" (which was elected in 1893), concluding with the words, "Clemenceau's lieutenant Camille Pelletan, Paul de Cassagnac, Léon Renault, Andrieux, and a few others alone are worth listening to." Unfortunately, of the four deputies who are thus esteemed to save "the present Chamber" from oratorical barrenness only one is a member of it, M. Pelletan, and he has ceased to be in any sense M. Clemenceau's lieutenant since the latter lost his seat in the Var, and reconstituted the Justice, with which journal M. Pelletan has now nothing to do. M. de Cassagnac was rejected at the general election; M. Léon Renault has been for years Senator of the Alpes Maritimes; and M. Andrieux has in vain essayed to return to the Palais Bourbon, of which he has not been an ornament since the Chamber of 1885. On the previous page M. Floquet is spoken of as a deputy, he also having lost his seat and being now a member of the Senate. In another passage in which M. Tirard is spoken of as "the late," implying that it was written within the last few months, there occurs a lively description of the Salle des Pas Perdus: "Here is M. de Freycinet—behind him come the Duc de la Rochefoucauld-Bisaccia and M. Challemeil Lacour." We venture to say that M. de Freycinet, who is a Senator, has never set foot in the Salle des Pas Perdus of the Chamber since he ceased to be a minister, long before M. Tirard's death. As for M. Challemeil Lacour, it has been since that event physically impossible for him to frequent the Chamber, for as President of the Senate he is tied to the Luxembourg; and it is years since M. de la Rochefoucauld dropped the title of Bisaccia, he being now known as the Duc de Doudeauville. Throughout these chapters M. Clemenceau is spoken of as an active force. He "is the idol of the English Radicals, who never fail to pay him a visit during their trips to Paris"—a very exaggerated statement, even if written at the time of M. Clemenceau's greatest power; at present the only English politician "who never fails to pay him a visit" in his retirement is a Liberal Unionist. It is quite possible that M. Clemenceau may resume his position of influence; but at the present moment it is nonsense to bracket him with M. Ribot, who has also retired into the background though still a member of the Chamber, and to say of them, "The struggle between these two is inevitable; it will be terrible, though not long." Amid all this out-of-date information about the men of yesterday, there is nothing about the deputies of to-day—MM. Casimir-Perier, Dupuy, Cavaignac, the Abbé Lemire, or the Socialist deputies. They may not be very interesting characters, but they are more interesting for the purposes of ephemeral journalistic sketches like those of the 'Note-Book' than are their predecessors.

In spite of the inaccuracies of its modern information, and in spite of the antiquity of its new stories, the volume will be worth two francs to read during a railway journey in France when it is published for that price in the Tauchnitz edition. It is difficult to extract from it any of its stories as specimens of the narrative portions of the book, as they are so long that the quotation of a couple of them would take up more space than the whole of this review. Here, however, is an abbreviated edition of one which M. Renan is said to have told about Émile Egger, and which fills over three pages in the 'Note-Book.' M. Renan's friend was invited to Compiègne, and was told that he had better take his manservant with him, a luxury which he did not possess; so he hired a temporary valet for the visit. It was after Orsini's attempt to assassinate the Emperor, and on arriving at the imperial château M. Egger, noticing the accent and dark complexion of his attendant, asked him if he were a Provençal, and heard, to his horror, that he was an Italian. The narrative proceeds:—

"'Great God,' says Egger to himself, 'what have I done! Here am I, a member of the Institute, a member of the Legion of Honour, a professor at one of the State colleges, an honoured guest of the sovereign, introducing an Italian into the palace, an Italian against whose appearance not a word can be said, but who may be, for all I know, a second Orsini or Pianori, who entered my service in order to carry out his fell designs upon Napoleon.' The upshot of all this was that Egger did not get a wink of sleep during the whole of his stay at the château, lest his valet should murder the Emperor. The valet lay trembling in his bed, listening for every sound, and every now and then rising to take a peep along the corridors, going as far as the Italian's resting-place in his dressing-room, opening the door softly, taking a peep at him by the light of the flickering candle, and then softly stealing to his bed, but not to rest. No words of mine could, however, convey the scene as enacted by Renan.....for Renan was prouder of his mimic talents than of all his philological attainments put together. One evening he got more than usually excited over the scene, and in his excitement snatched the crust frame from the table in order to represent Egger carrying a dark lantern—though there was not the slightest evidence that Egger had such an article at hand."

The following story is about M. Mollard, a former "introducateur des Ambassadeurs" under the Republic, to whose peculiarities a long chapter of the 'Note-Book' is devoted. For a soirée at the Ministry of Finance, the author says, this functionary engaged as assistants in the cloak-room two peasants, who were cousins of a keeper of a wine-shop he frequented "at the Pont de l'Alma"—on the Place de l'Alma, we suppose he means:—

"At that particular period the opera hat had been temporarily discarded for its more sightly rival the silk one.....the proportion of silk hats worn that evening by the guests of Madame la Ministre was as five to one opera hat.....Fate so willed it that the first four or five men who availed themselves of the peasants' services wore opera hats, which they flattened in the orthodox fashion by putting them against their chests. After that every hat, whether silk or other, was subjected to the same process of 'foreshortening,' probably after its owner was gone and space became scant. The scene at the Ministry of Finance was, as MacMahon called it, 'the comic afterpiece to the tragedy at Versailles,' but it saved M. Mollard from dismissal. 'My time is running short,' said the Marshal; 'besides, I could never do away with a man who afforded me ten minutes of such unalloyed amusement.'"

The most satisfactory feature of this volume is that its French quotations, which are numerous, are generally written in idiomatic though unrefined French, and the blunders we have noticed in them can be traced to careless revision and proof-reading. The author's French is better than his English, and he writes most inoffensively when he translates literally from the notes of his "Dutch uncles." For instance, where he describes Napoleon III. at the first representation of 'Les Éffrontés' "giving the signal for applause," he uses the consecrated formula of the Parisian journalist who describes the visit of the chief of the State to a theatre. M. Carnot "gives the signal for applause" every time he is seen at a play. As an example of the 'Note-Book' writer's unaided English style may be quoted his description of M. Mollard, whom he did not like, as "a sublimated butler." But it is less picturesque than that of M. Arthur Meyer, who, he says, is "a natty little man," or that of another editor, whom he considers "stylish-looking." We would, however, forgive him his vulgarity if it were redeemed by geniality.

Burke's Landed Gentry. 2 vols. (Harrison & Sons.)

EIGHT years have now elapsed since the last edition of this work, and the transfer of its editorship from Sir Bernard to his sons combines with the admission of "more than five hundred additional pedigrees" to invest with unusual interest the present issue. The familiar coat of the late Ulster still appears upon the title-page, and the work, to all outward appearance, remains the same as it was. It becomes a duty, therefore, to lay stress upon the fact that the book is a private enterprise of no official authority, and that the presence of a pedigree in its pages is no proof of its authenticity. It is the more necessary to give this warning because the editors "confidently" believe that their work "will be found a reliable authority on the subject of which it treats, and an adequate and faithful record of an influential class."

That errors are inevitable in such a production, that slips innumerable must creep in, may at once be conceded. It is rather to its general characteristics that we propose to address ourselves, selecting, where needful, typical instances to illustrate and prove our points. We must ask, at the outset, what evidence there is that the families comprised in this work are "landed gentry" at all. That some possess no claim to rank as such is obvious enough from its pages. If the editors will not give, from the 'Return of Owners of Land,' the acreage possessed by each family in 1883—as is done in his 'Complete Peerage' by G. E. C.—they should at least inform the reader in their preface what qualification, if any, is required for admission. When residents in the suburbs are accorded a place among the landed aristocracy, while there are families of property and position which do not figure in these pages, it is simply misleading to represent the work as "a comprehensive history" of "the untitled" as the Peerage is of the titled "aristocracy of this realm." Our next point is the want of any sense of proportion. A column suffices for Okeover of Okeover, a column and a half for Kingcote of Kingcote, and even half a column for Edgecombe of Edgecombe, while families who have only recently acquired landed estate require three or four columns for their very uninteresting pedigrees. We have spoken of the large number of accessions to the "landed gentry" found in these volumes; and though there is nothing to show which are the new pedigrees, collation, of course, detects them. Our criticisms fall under three heads. We object to the admission of owners of suburban or similar residences as "landed gentry"; to that of individuals who lease a house and quietly enter it as their "seat," perhaps without owning an acre of land; and to the representation of newcomers as of old standing in the county. Of the first class it would be invidious to supply instances, which will be obvious enough to the judicious reader. Of the second we note in the additions at least two instances under Essex alone. One is "Green of Wyvenhoe Hall," which "seat" (as it is termed) was only leased, its lease expiring even before this work appeared. Its late occupant also enters his forefathers as "of Stanway Hall," when that seat (see p. 495) was in possession of the De Horne family, while his descent from the noble family of Egerton may be commended to the critical investigation of Somerset Herald. It is clear that no family should be admitted on the strength of possessing a "seat" which does not belong to them, and we would strongly urge that heads of families, especially novi homines, should be asked in future to specify the date at which the estate was purchased. This is frankly done in such cases as "Mackenzie of Fawley Court" and "Briggs of Hylton Castle," whose brief and straightforward memoirs cannot but inspire respect. We may note, in this connexion, another new-comer, "Dickinson of Bambrorough," which enters its ancestor as "of Bambrorough Castle" a century ago, though the Crewe trustees possessed and occupied it then as now. This is another memoir for the inclusion of which no ground is apparent. The town of Lydd, we may add, is given as the "seat" of the Denno family, which here claims descent from the "butler to Edward the Confessor."

Another misleading practice is that of giving as the "lineage" the pedigree of former owners of the estate from which the present holder is not descended. No one, for instance, looking at the pedigrees of Chute of the Vyne, Rehov of Wyvenhoo Park, or Cardinal of Holly Court, could discover without minute scrutiny that this is the case, as it seems to be also, for all that we can see, with "the ancient and knightly family of Turbervill." Very different is the entry under "Pusey of Pusey," where the family has taken the greatest care to separate its lineage from that of the Puseys, the former owners of the seat.

As to genealogy, the 'Landed Gentry' ranks a good deal lower than the 'Peerage,' which, under the lash of criticism, has slowly mended its ways. Thus, on one of the opening pages, the descent from the Duffa of Moldavit, abandoned by the Duke of Fife, rears once more its head among what are termed "some interesting pedigrees." Broadly speaking, the errors to be noted fall into two groups: those, often of long standing, which relate to old and leading families, and those traceable, not to heralds in the past, but to pedigree makers in the present. Officers-of-arms, of course, may claim to take their stand on a descent of "eighteen generations" from the Conquest "certified" to Dugdale by Sir William Carleton at the visitation of 1665, or may hold that an "authentically deduced" pedigree "registered in the College of Arms, London," is proof that the Baskervilles descend from the only child of that "joyful mother of children," the much-married Nesta of Wales. But heralds, like general councils, "may err, and sometimes have erred."

If we keep to the really old families—rari nantes in gurgite vasto—we find their interesting pedigrees marred by ignorance or folly. The founder of the Kingscotes is "Nigell Fitz-Arthur, grandson of Anagerus the Saxon, living 985, m. Adeva, dau. of Robert Fitz Harding, grandson of Sueno, the 3rd King of Denmark, by Eva, niece of William the Conqueror." So Nigel's grandfather lived in 985, while his father-in-law flourished in 1166! The family, of course, was no more connected with the King of Denmark than it was with William the Conqueror. This reminds us that "Roger Berchelai," the alleged founder of the Barclays, is not recorded to have held land "temp. Edward the Confessor," or to have left a son John. The Giffards of Chillington, again, are alleged to descend from Osborn Giffard (1086), whose parentage is undetermined, but who is here made son of Osborn de Bolebec, "living in the time of [Duke] Richard I." (943-996). That Scrope of Danby descends from the famous Richard Fitz Scrope is, notoriously, a mere guess, as are the statements that the Fulfords of Fulford are "of Saxon origin," and that "there is no doubt" of the Stauntons being settled in Notts before the Conquest. Domesday Book will be searched in vain for "Stephanus de Eisforde of Eisforde in the reign of William the Conqueror." The Edgecumbes' "deed in Norman-French," which is "dated 'in the twelfth year of the Conquest,'" is a curiosity we should like to see, as are those "grants from the Crown prior to the Conquest" which trace back the Reed family a thousand years. No MSS. can prove the descent of "the ancient Saxon family of Ethelstone from the time of Athelstan," or persuade us that the ancestor of the Kynnersleys, halbert in hand, defied the Domesday Commissioners "in his castle gate." And we are as sure that the ancestor of the Mitfords was not "in possession of Mitford Castle in the time of Edward the Confessor" as that Sybil Mitford did not marry "a son of the Lord Dignam, in Normandy." Equally wild is the statement that the Beckwiths spring from the union of "Sir Hercules Malobisse, circa 1226, with "the Lady Dame Beckwith, dau. of Sir Wm. Bruce." In the Yorkshire "Becvi" of Domesday we have, doubtless, the origin of the name. "Sir Titus Seudamore, Lord of Troy," whose father was "living 4 William Rufus," and whose son rejoiced in the name of "Sir Wilcock," is another of these monstrosities.

When the whole work is a museum for the mummies of departed errors, we cannot wonder that the editors have not yet discovered that the alleged ancestor of the Bassets—"Thurstan Bassot [who] came into England with William I., who gave him the manor of Drayton"—was not a Bassot at all, as Mr. Eyton has shown, Domesday being here at fault. Nor have they yet learnt that Ernulf, the alleged ancestor of the Swintons, was not descended from his "Saxon" predecessors, or that the "grant from King Edward I.," which proves the Selbys "beyond doubt" to have held their estate ever since, was really a grant from Edward Balliol, and did not refer to Biddlestone, now the seat of that ancient house. As both these corrections have appeared in the Genealogist, it is surprising to learn from the preface that "every available source of information has been exhausted" by the editors. And, if they would only look at the printed Inquisitions they refer to, they would learn that the Shropshire house of More held by more personal serjeanty, not by "the supply of 200 men as a body-guard" to the king. There seems to be now a growing practice of quoting from well-known records statements which they do not contain. Thus we read that "in Domesday Book, folio, vol. i., p. 287 are enrolled the names of Robertus de Sibetorp and Willelmus de Sibetorp." Nothing could be more precise—or more devoid of truth. Domesday mentions, in this passage, William Peterel and his "man" Robert. Surely Domesday Book is an "available source" to the editors.

Of quite another class are the descents provided for the novi homines. These have a character all their own and are easily recognizable by the expert. The worst of these attempts to represent as of old status in their county families which are nothing of the kind is that if, as usual, skilfully made, they can only be actually exposed by a special search which is not worth the while of any one to undertake. The simplest plan of detecting such pedigrees is to turn to a county history published before they were heard of. It is well known that to bear a place-name is no proof of descent from the owners of that place. And yet not only is this assumed, but the mention of a township in Domesday is sometimes adduced to prove the antiquity of a family bearing its name. Of "Hensworth" we read: "This very ancient family is stated to have been seated in Yorkshire since the Conquest. The name appears in Domesday Book as 'Hamelesworde.'" The suspicious look of the pedigree, however, is not lessened by its change of Daniel into "David" (1701), of 1686 into 1668, and of Pottorion into "Potter Newton." Another Leeds family, also a recent addition, begins with a certain Fitz Otes "amongst the followers of William the Conqueror." A worse case, however, is "Trotter of Byers Hall." This pedigree has been constantly altered since it first appeared in 1863, starting from the days of the Confessor, and now begins in 1380. But fresh "purple patches" have been added in compensation. The Tunnard family, a less recent arrival, has not been fortunate in its sacer calce, who claims that it was granted lands at the Conquest, but rashly adds that "Alan Townehyd possessed a good estate 6 Edward III." Remembering that Alnwick had its "Town herd" and Shrewsbury its "Town swineherd," the reader will not feel much doubt as to the true origin of the name.

Irish pedigrees, as might be expected, bulk largely in these volumes. To the "Cromwellians" there is no need to allude, nor to say more of the "Strongbow-nians" than to assure the editors they would render a service to historical students if they would publish the roll, doubtless in the Ulster Office, from which they must have learnt that Peter Giffard, Sir William Chevre, and Sir Andrew Wyse accompanied and fought under Strongbow. The elaborate pedigree of the Wysses, moreover, fails to explain how or when they acquired "the Manor of St. John's," or how their head, "as lineal descendant of the original grantee, in 1172, inherited the rights of the Prior of St. John." It is rather to the Celtic families that attention should be directed. We can trace no intelligible principle in the awarding of their hereditary distinctions. On what ground is the chieftainship of a sept deemed to descend to the heir male, when it descended irregularly, and required formal investiture? In the case of "The O'Reilly," of Brighton, descended from a younger son of a "Prince of East Brefsny," there is no attempt even to prove male heirship or user of the title. "The MacDermot," of Coolavin, claims, indeed, to be chief of his name; but if, as descended from the princes of Moylurg, he is "Prince of Coolavin," surely "The O'Reilly" should be Prince of Brighton. Why, again, is the chieftainship ignored in the case of O'Callaghan while recognized in the case of O'Donovan or "O'Morchoe"? The Murphys, who claim the latter title, actually go so far, we see, as to name their eldest son "The Tanist"! When we turn to the great native families, such as Kavanagh of Borris and McCarty of Carrignavar, we find them quite contented with their status as country gentlemen, not masquerading as latter-day princes or Tanists.

The mention of the Kavanaghs reminds us that their ancestor, who was created Lord Ballyanne for life in 1554 (not "1 and 2 Mary I."), is here stated to have died "before 1554," while the pedigree begins with impossible chronology. No less careless is the "lineage" of the Queen's Champion, whose exact descent is not supplied, and who, surely, more than "claims" the Champion's office. To speak of "baronetries [sic] still in abeyance" is another instance of careless editing; but it is not of this that we complain so much as of the misleading character of the work. The editors have now a great opportunity; let them begin by restricting themselves in future to the class with which alone they profess to deal, the land-owning gentry, and let each memoir be, as is not yet the case, "most carefully revised." Unless they undertake some such reform, the prestige of this well-known work must inevitably suffer.

The Bard of the Dimbovitza. Second Series. By Hélène Vacaresco. Translated by Carmen Sylva and Alma Strettell. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

RARELY does a twice-gleaned field furnish forth such a rich store as has been gathered together in the Dimbovitza by Mlle. Hélène Vacaresco, and rarely have such admirable translators been found as Miss Alma Strettell and the distinguished lady who is known in the world of letters as Carmen Sylva. So far as we are able to judge, both the gleaner and the translators have shown their entire fitness for their respective offices by giving these passionate outpourings of love, hate, misery, and despair as much as possible in the very words in which they were wrung from the hearts of the peasants. These poems have all the fierce intensity of the best of the Corsican eccori without their occasional ferocity—not to say brutality. Nor is there the same grotesque choice of epithets of endearment in the Roumanian as in the Corsican; in fact, the former are on an infinitely higher level, and there is hardly one of them that does not come straight from the heart and go as straight to it. They treat of all that peasants are called on to be, and do, and suffer in real life; but in addition to this, they bear witness to a firm faith in the power of working weal or woe by means of incantations, and an ever-present apprehension of the terror that walketh by night. Many of these poems, therefore, become still more interesting because of the strange glimpses that they afford of unfamiliar folk-beliefs. In 'The Orphan' the young girl has made a tryst with her mother's soul by the well:—

Into the well I shall look down to see her,
Yet shall not dare to gaze upon her face;
But she will take a long, long look at me.

Upon the house, too, she will look, and then Satanine will linger round the house to-morrow.
Upon my heart, too, she will look, and then
My heart will be at rest.

And I shall ask: "How is it in the grave?"
Then I shall see her image, in the well,
With finger on its lip.

And I shall ask her: "Dost thou yearn for me?"
Then shall I see her image in the well
Drying its eyes;

And in her girdle I shall see the flowers,
Yea, all the flowers I cast upon her grave.

Here we find that, for some superstitious reason, the girl may not look in the face of the mother, but only look down and see its reflection in the water of the well. We wish that some explanation of this had been given, and still more we wish that Mlle. Vacaresco would gather together as much of the folk-lore of the country as she can.

In this poem the orphan speaks of the heavy stone that will fall again on her mother's grave, which seems to point to the fact of her having been buried—as peasants were buried in out-of-the-way places in Corsica not many years ago—in a common grave. It was a large, deep, stable-lantern-shaped grave with a small opening at the top, over which a large stone was placed, which was rolled back when a funeral had to take place. The corpse, wrapped in a winding sheet, but with no coffin, was dropped down into this pit, and then the stone was replaced.

'The Incantation' is also a poem that is interesting to folk-lorists. In England country girls stick pins into an onion when they want to force a laggard in love to come to them—perhaps because an onion may be said to be heart-shaped, and they wish his heart to know no rest till he comes. In Roumania they gently wave a hazel-bough over the ashes of the fire, but they mean the result to be much more distressful than any which is ever contemplated by English girls. 'The Necklace of Tears,' though not such a fine poem as many, is in rhyme and shorter than 'Still-born' or 'The Widow,' so we will quote part of it:—

The little maid was fain to make herself

A necklace fine.

As silv'ry as the moonlight's silv'ry glance,
Or as the river when the moonbeams shine.

She asks the moon for its silvery glance,
The river for its moonlit waters, but in vain:

Then said the sons of men: "Come, take our tears
To fashion this bright silver chain of thine."

Then each one gave her his most precious tears,
And glad were they

To deck the maiden's throat; and all the tears

Thus whispered low together, and did say:

"Whence art thou, sister, from what heart dost come?"

Then each one told the grief that did befall
Her parent heart, and each one thought herself
Saddest of all.

So now the maiden had her necklace bright,
More silvery than yonder river's wave,
Or glance of moonlight, yet when she put on
That necklace brave,

The tears all told her whence they came, and grew
So heavy, that beneath the burden sore,
The maiden died, and on her grave that chain
Weighs evermore.

NEW NOVELS.

The Green Bay Tree. By W. H. Wilkins and Herbert Vivian. 3 vols. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THIS is an unusually successful case of collaboration, for, though the authors are at pains to indicate the chapters and paragraphs for which they are respectively responsible, the different parts are admirably welded together, so that it is difficult even with this knowledge to detect any differences of workmanship or division of interest. As the title implies, it is a novel describing the triumph of the wicked man and the miserable end of the just man—an interesting enough subject for a novelist of Mr. Vivian's cynical power; but, unfortunately, it is just in this main idea, or rather in the way it is carried out, that the book most signally fails. In the very laudable object of justifying the complaints of the Psalmist quoted in the preface, the authors overreach themselves, for it is quite impossible that a man with Coryton's characteristics and record should not have been found out and well kicked before the end of the first volume. For one thing, a boy with the plausible, oily manner of Coryton is invariably an object of suspicion, and not of popularity, with other boys, who are as a rule exceedingly shrewd judges of character; and an undergraduate who had carried on such shady manoeuvres at Cambridge would unfailingly have been turned out of decent society. Besides, his methods of self-aggrandisement are too absurdly crude; a man of Coryton's ability would never have been such a fool as to cheat at cards or to defraud a prostitute of money. But even if Coryton were a possible character his wife certainly is not; it is inconceivable that a girl of Vixie's upbringing could have become so cynically unscrupulous with such rapidity. There are other improbabilities of character and absurdities of incident which are a distinct blot on the book. But in spite of these faults it is a brilliant and most amusing book; the story can be neglected, as perhaps the authors meant it to be, and the accounts of Cambridge life, of the Kur-ort, of country-house entertainments, and of an election may be enjoyed unreservedly. The sketches of the earnest undergraduates, who worship themselves and one another, and of the Union "smugs" are rather viciously exaggerated; still there is enough truth in them to make any University man laugh aloud over them, and unjust though they are, they, at any rate, give one view current in the University about these enthusiasts. Some of the scenes in this book raise the question how far it is permissible to introduce living characters into fiction under thin disguises. These authors have some considerable names on whom to rely for precedents, and on the whole we are inclined to think that they have not unduly exceeded in the liberty they have taken with well-known politicians. The habit is really inexcusable when comparatively obscure personages are pilloried in such a way that the only possible reason for the practice would seem to be the fictitious interest aroused by attempts to "spot" the characters. But Messrs. Wilkins and Vivian have not done this; the politicians are obvious to anybody. A politician probably expects, if he does not wish for, more publicity for his characteristics than other men; and in this case the revelations do not appear unfairly malicious or outrageous. There are some excellent stories in these volumes, and the style is bright and crisp.

A Hidden Chain. By Dora Russell. 3 vols. (Digby, Long & Co.)

EVA MOORE finds herself much impeded by the fetter of matrimony, forged in her early youth, though her endeavours to ignore it are for some time successful. It is hard to imagine that a girl, however lightly equipped with principle or knowledge of the world, could have supposed she was really relieved from the bonds which connected her with the gloomy and unsympathetic parson, though he went so far as to Africa to avoid her company. Still less is the likelihood that even so impetuous a lover as "the young lord" would take a young lady upon trust who vouchsafed him no information, except that there were good reasons why he should not marry her. But the probabilities of the story are only less flimsy than its moral. The strongest attachment will not justify bigamy, and tragic as is the fate of the lovers, we confess that the unamiable Mr. Temple has the best reason to complain of his lot. The scene which most strongly appeals to our sense of justice is that in which Clair horsewhips the treacherous banker, who attempts to utilize for base purposes the helplessness of his unlucky client. The story is fairly told, though such strange lapses as the use of the word "gist" in the sense of "gist" or purport are somewhat harrowing.

A Hunted Life. By J. Fogerty. 3 vols. (Hutchinson & Co.)

Irish stories are becoming more and more plentiful, as the harvest of opportunities for weaving plots of agrarian crime, bloodshed, and murder with complete realism is brought home to the thirsting novelist. Mr. Fogerty's "episode" draws its slow but fairly pleasant length through three volumes at a gentle pace, which is only quickened when it reaches the murder of a landlord's wife with the usual accompaniments of Land League tyranny. The successive crimes are all well described, and so are the events immediately connected with them. The earlier portions of the story are not exciting as narrated by the tedious and excellent young man, who expresses himself after the manner of Sandford and Merton's Mr. Barlow on all occasions. That the name of "Jemima" should have clung to him from his earliest schooldays, and in spite of his heroic performances with the bull, is not surprising; for Jemima the amiable prig remains to the latest page of his career in the story. By the way, he appears to credit not Bacon but "Mr. O'Connell" with the famous sentence (inaccurately quoted) about revenge.

The Real Charlotte. By E. C. Somerville and Martin Ross. 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

'THE REAL CHARLOTTE' is a real acquisition, for it is a novel well outside the wayworn track of the common or three-volume novelist. The joint authors have between them furnished such qualities as fresh and original observation on Irish persons, places, and things; humour of a singularly agreeable kind; and revelations of character trenchant and striking, and happily devoid of analysis and tedious dissection of motive. Even Dublin people, though they may not feel altogether flattered, must enjoy these pictures of Irish middle-class life, the sprinkling of county folk, and glimpses of the peasant and servant classes. They cannot help it, for these are, in their way, admirable. The differences, marked in kind rather than in degree, between them and their Saxon equivalents are excellently chosen and cleverly touched. Those subtler aspects of race and individuals that escape the many are conveyed with a skill and power all the more notable because of the absence of apparent exaggeration or direct purpose. One is grateful that the brogue—the virulent Dublin brogue—is suggested, and not insisted on. Many times and oft have the reckless, rollicking, untidy, needy Irish households served for material in fiction. Here the freshness of insight and presentation distinguishes them even in their sordidness from the rest. More than one family interests or amuses. There are the Fitzpatricks, the Lamberts, old Miss Duffy, the Dysarts, and the Mullens, who are all more or less entertaining, pathetic, or curious. But in Francis Fitzpatrick, rather than in Charlotte Mullen, the chief attraction is to be found. In spite of the seeming ease with which Francis's portrait is executed, we should fancy it was not the least difficult part of the book. She is one of the most interesting young women lately presented in any novel. Her ways, manners, and personality generally take hold of the reader. To continue to interest, even to charm, with the kind of material that goes to her composition can have been no light task. She possesses just the qualities—negative and positive—most difficult to treat in fiction. If her points were added up it would have to be allowed that she is a flirt, second-rate, small-minded, frivolous, untidy, vain, even commonplace; without courage, determination, proper pride, or conspicuous graces of charity or gentleness. Yet, being "with this, and without that," there is an inexpressible something that makes one understand why most men and some women in the story love her. Perhaps it is that, though exactly the reverse of the perfect woman nobly planned, she is a real woman, with moments of sweet, untouched innocence and trustfulness, that show what, under different circumstances and influences of upbringing, she might have been. Her lack of self-consciousness, morbid introspection, or critical power, her longing for happiness and yet acceptance of misfortune, make her a touching and pleasing contrast to the Dodos and Asters of the moment. The test of her lifelikeness is the reader's own pitying affection and longing that she should fall into the hands of some strong and trustworthy husband. In Charlotte there is plenty of clever technique, but nothing like this divination. She is a thoughtfully built-up structure, not, like Francis, a wild flower sprung on a dust-heap none knows how. Charlotte is a sort of lune natura, and a little reminiscent of a figure in Balzac. Such a capable and, at the same time, dreadful person would, we feel sure, have studied the art of cookery, although an Irishwoman! The book may be too long, but there are so many amusing and delightful passages, humorous sayings and doings, with here and there a word or a line that gives away the very heart of an Irish landscape or a man or woman, that we really cannot complain.

Under the Red Robe. By Stanley Weyman. 2 vols. (Methuen & Co.)

'UNDER THE RED ROBE' is another of Mr. Weyman's excellent historical romances. The matter is, as usual, of the best; the same may always be said of the manner. The epoch chosen is the time of Richelieu's greatest power and influence, which is only saying in other words that Mr. Weyman has put his finger on an impressive moment in history. The hero, as was the case in 'A Gentleman of France,' is inclined to elderliness; but De Berault, unlike the other, has a rascally record. Had it not been for a service he has rendered to the great Cardinal in the past, his career, like those of his victims in the duel, would have been unnaturally shortened. But in consideration of this and his promise to unearth and deliver over a certain M. de Cochefort, who is "wanted," he obtains a reprieve—whereby hangs the tale. In De Berault there are two strains. Under the influence of the one he is capable of acts of delicate chivalry and devotion; when the other is in the ascendant he shows himself a cheat and a bully. His is not so much a story of introspection and motive, however, as of incident and action. The contradictions of the man's nature are made the efficient cause of a very stirring chain of events. As a study of character De Berault is not without interest; but all that is subordinate to the spirit of the age and its continual movement and episodic character. The illustrations do not advance the interest and charm of the story—rather the reverse. They produce an appearance of the "story-book for the young," and are in themselves neither sufficiently dramatic nor intrinsically beautiful. Mr. Weyman's own effects are all the reader wants, and they are, as usual, masterly—including the introduction on more than one occasion of the great figure of the Cardinal. 'Under the Red Robe' may not be the author's best book, but it is such a long way in advance of the ordinary historical novel that it will be received with gratitude and pleasure.

A Real Repentance: a Story of Oberammergau. By Austin Clare. 2 vols. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

THERE may still be people about the world to pore over stories of the type of 'A Real Repentance.' They are probably not of the young girl genus. To her, once on a time, such volumes were presented and by her perused. Now she is otherwise employed, and her reading has taken a much wider range. This story of Oberammergau, its manners and customs, ideal peasantry, and the rest, is not particularly natural or convincing, and reads a little like a survival. It describes one of the famous dramatic representations, with, as it were, a drama within a drama, for some of the characters and situations happen to reflect the circumstances of some of the peasant actors' own little lives. It is all very earnest and moral, and it leaves no impression of anything in particular. The story is the reverse of vivid; it is laboured, conventional, and devoid of atmosphere and real insight into character. The two volumes are, however, conscientiously written, with the best intentions if not the highest performance. If anything, they should tend to elevate the "moral fibre," though they may depress the spirits of the reader.

The Translation of a Savage. By Gilbert Parker. (Methuen & Co.)

IN this book it is to be welcomed an improvement on Mr. Parker's last novel, 'Mrs. Falchion,' which was in itself an excellent performance. But there a really good book was to some extent marred by a certain inclination to discursiveness, which prevented the novel being as compact as it might have been; here there is no lack of due concentration, and consequently no division of interest; there is, on the contrary, a simple directness of purpose which is one of the first requisites of a good novel, and, on the whole, one of the hardest for a young novelist to fulfil. It requires a good deal of experience or of study to induce an author who knows about life in Canada, say, and voyages on an Orient liner, as Mr. Parker does, not to drag in both topics; but on this occasion the temptation has been avoided. The idea of the story is original: an Englishman marries a Red Indian chieftainess out of pique, and then sends her over to his relations, who belong to an old county family, for them to make the best they can out of her; the subsequent development of her career provides the main interest of the story. Although Mr. Parker may not be quite convincing in his presentation of her later state, or not sufficiently careful in marking all the stages of her progress, her story is a very charming one, and not without considerable humour, especially at the beginning. The other characters also are exceedingly well presented, and special gratitude is due to the author for the welcome change he introduces of making them all pleasant and amiable without making them dull. Even one lady who is at first inclined to be disagreeable ends by being as charming as any of them.

Mr. Sadler's Daughters. By Hugh Coleman Davidson. (Chatto & Windus.)

THE NAÏVE and colloquial manner in which a story about some strange personages is related almost disarms criticism, and indeed there is little to say about it, excepting that it is harmlessly eventful, extremely improbable, and occasionally amusing, in a sense not exactly intended by the author. Mr. Davidson appears to have written other books; it is therefore surprising that the present one should be as amateur in manner as it is in other essentials. Mr. Sadler is more like a character out of a burlesque than a serious attempt at portraying a human being, and the same remark applies to several of his acquaintances, including the enterprising jewel robber.

Pembroke. By Mary E. Wilkins. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

MISS WILKINS, like Mrs. Francis, after winning glory by her short stories, has undertaken a novel of a more ambitious character; but much as there is that is pleasing in 'Pembroke,' it is not such a successful venture as 'Dan.' In the latter book there is no trace of a 'prentice hand; on the contrary, it has a unity and completeness almost remarkable under the circumstances; but 'Pembroke,' while evidently the work of a greater writer, is wanting in that concentration of interest of which Miss Wilkins sees the necessity in her shorter stories. The title 'Pembroke,' which is the name of a village, shows where the defect lies: it is rather dangerous to take a village instead of an individual as the centre of interest, though, of course, there have been successful cases, of which, however, this is not one. Under the somewhat artificial unity of place an excuse is given for introducing various individual interests which are somewhat distracting.

In the first place the close relationships and a certain similarity of names make it rather difficult to keep the threads of the different stories apart; then, for example, the story of Barnabas Thayer's interrupted courtship of Charlotte Barnard is in itself quite enough interest for one story, and the other incidents do little more than complicate it unnecessarily; while the relevancy of the other love-affairs is not saved by the evident intention of further pointing by them the lesson suggested by Barnabas's case, that obstinacy in lovers and their parents causes the chief impediment to true love. The whole book is a terrible indictment of obstinacy, and gives the most lurid pictures of the way in which sullenness, like some foul fungus, gradually sucks out all the goodness in a man's nature. Especially powerful is the fancy shared by Barnabas and his neighbours that his obstinacy is gradually bringing on a physical deformity: it is an idea worthy of Hawthorne, who knew well the mysterious effect of a similar subtle suggestion of an undefined horror. Admirable, too, in itself is the story of Sylvia Crane and her love for Richard Alger. In such a scene as that where Sylvia mistakes Barnabas for her lover Miss Wilkins's remarkable power for telling effects of pathos comes out brilliantly, as it does again in the weird marriage of William and Rebecca on that night of snow and shame; while for pure charm of description the dance at the cherry-feast is one of many passages to be lingered over. Altogether 'Pembroke' is a book full of strong situations and of deep human interest, but it would be better still if it were broken up into separate short stories dealing with the different incidents and characters.

Sir Joseph's Heir. By Claude Bray. (Warne & Co.)

WE never could see why a novel should not be improbable, or, if the author choose to make it so, impossible, provided that the sentiments be suited to the situations, and the diction to both sentiment and situation. But when the betting is about a thousand to one that a certain event could not happen at all; when it is "all Lombard Street to a China orange" that its consequences would be otherwise than we are told; and when, further, the author makes the people interested in this event act like persons of melodrama and speak like leading articles, there is no excuse for him or for his book. That sums up our opinion of 'Sir Joseph's Heir.' A curmudgeon is not likely to leave a fortune to a nephew, whom he has never allowed to marry, on condition that he finds and weds a wife within seventy-two hours. Nor is he likely to be supposed dead before his time. Nor is the nephew likely to fall in with a young woman he has not already by accident once and no more, and to persuade her to change her name, but not her condition, for a thousand a year. Nor is a general reconciliation likely to be the result. "People don't do such things," as Dr. Ibsen says somewhere, and if they did they would not talk about them so vulgarly as Mr. Claude Bray seems to suppose.

MANUALS OF ENGLISH HISTORY.

English History for American Readers. By T. W. Higginson and E. Channing. (Longmans & Co.)—This is not at all a bad book, though it cannot be said that the writers have been altogether successful in working out the very excellent ideas with which they started. That American readers should realize that their own history is but a continuation of English history is surely much to be desired, both from the American and from the English point of view, and it would be difficult to praise too highly the spirit in which Messrs. Higginson and Channing have undertaken their task. "The history of these islands," they say on their very first page, "until within two centuries and a half ago, is a part of American history; without it we cannot understand our own institutions, or trace the history of our ancestors." The scale of the book is small—necessarily so, say our authors, because "it is not the practice of American readers, old or young, to give to English history more than a very limited portion of their hours of study." But the well-thought-out policy which cuts down those parts of the narrative that are regarded as less directly interesting to the American accures to the writers a reasonable amount of space to deal with the development of institutions and national character, and to write with a fair measure of fulness on Puritanism, and on the period which immediately preceded and followed the establishment of the American colonies. In the later part of the book the writers have shown an admirable impartiality in dealing with the story of the separation of the thirteen colonies from the mother country, and in treating of the frequently disturbed relations between England and the United States in more recent times. The book plainly stands in a very close relation to Mr. S. R. Gardiner's well-known school history, and both in style and general treatment partakes of its leading qualities: its sober good sense, its well-balanced proportion, its practical usefulness as a class book, and its clear and business-like, but, we must add, its flat and uninspiring style. Nearly all the illustrations seem to be directly taken from Mr. Gardiner's book. There are a useful bibliography and some rather moderate maps. Unluckily the writers do not seem to be deeply versed in the details of English history, and they have sometimes, especially in the earlier half of the book, deviated very far from their chief guide. Among other mistakes may be noted statements like the following: "After his father's death, the younger Balliol made an alliance with the French king. He soon found himself a prisoner in London Tower." There were in mediæval England "two classes of persons called, technically, 'religious'—the secular and regular." By ignoring the mediæval history of Ireland, including the whole story of the Norman conquest, and starting its history with Poyning's law and Henry VIII., the writers give a very false impression of the relations of England and Ireland. And their account of the Elizabethan conquest of Ireland, short as it is, bristles with small errors. Again, the reader is told that it was in Elizabeth's reign that "William Tyndale produced.....the first important translation of the Bible into English." Yet the story of the seventeenth century is told with considerable spirit and commendable accuracy: but Scott's novels can hardly be trusted quite so completely as the writers suggest for giving pictures of manners; and they are apparently still under the impression that the famous song "And shall Trelawny die?" is a genuine ballad of the Revolution period. The latter part of the history falls off slightly in spirit, but improves in accuracy. Were the blemishes, of which we have given a few samples, removed, as they easily might be in a second edition, the book would deserve to be extensively used in American schools. But there is still no book that will give the grown-up American reader the same broad and general view of English history as Mr. Goldwin Smith's vigorous and masterly sketch of the political history of the United States affords to the British reader who wishes to know the great turning-points of American history.

The Elements of English Constitutional History. By F. C. Montague. (Longmans & Co.)—This is a decidedly good little book: careful in its statements, judicious in its views, fairly methodical in its arrangements, and well written, though in rather too jerky a style. It will be of considerable use to those who, having got a good acquaintance with the ordinary text-books of English history, wish to get a general notion of the growth and structure of the Constitution. Yet we cannot quite agree with Prof. Montague that there is no other book which aims precisely at the object of this one. There are, in fact, almost too many "easy introductions" to Stubbs and Hallam, and the number should not be lightly increased, or without a distinct purpose. Moreover, we rather fear that, with all its merits, Mr. Montague's book can hardly be said "to give such an account of the growth of English institutions as may be intelligible to those who are only beginning to read history." On the contrary, many of Mr. Montague's allusions and generalizations require a rather considerable familiarity with the subject. He tells us too many facts, and he assumes too much knowledge. His style and method of treatment are too difficult and abstract to be within the ken of the ordinary schoolboy, or even of the ordinary person who has outgrown the schoolboy stage, but is not particularly well informed in English history. Had Mr. Montague spread out half the information he has supplied over the same space he has occupied, and had he more carefully selected simple expressions and explained all the many points to which he airily alludes, he would have been a great deal nearer in attaining his purpose. As it is, his method suggests that he does not quite realize the limitations which nature has imposed on ordinary human knowledge and capacity. But though Mr. Montague's book will not quite attain, it is to be feared, his own special object, it will be of very great use in other directions. It is, on the whole, better than any other of the short introductions to English constitutional history that we are acquainted with. It is clearer, more literary, less repulsive in its mass of facts, and better put together. It will leave the student nothing to unlearn and build a good foundation for wider knowledge.

Longman's Ship Historical Readers.—Book VI. The Stuart Period. By S. R. Gardiner. (Longmans & Co.)—The elementary schoolboy is wronged by the stiffness of the Government system which has in practice made the teaching of national history the occasional exception rather than, as it ought to be, the universal rule in our primary schools; but he has some compensation when the "reading books" from which, with good luck and memory, he can pick up a few scraps of historical truth, are written down for him by an historian so eminent as Mr. S. R. Gardiner. Mr. Gardiner's name is a more than sufficient guarantee that a book on the Stuart period will contain the best summary of what is really known, told clearly and, on the whole, impartially. We can, moreover, praise the directness and simplicity of the style, though it is not always certain that the exact selection of facts has been judicious. Is it worth while to talk about the "Great Contract" when no effort is made to explain what that transaction was? It might have been better to have allotted more space to those picturesque sides of the history which would be most likely to impress the imagination of young readers. In fact, we think Mr. Gardiner has followed too closely the division of the subject laid down in his larger school-books. Neither is it possible altogether to praise his arrangement in another respect. He first furnishes a summary of the period, and then, in the form of biographies of Eliot, Hampden, Cromwell, Milton, Shaftesbury, and William III., practically tells the story over again, for his biographies, admirable as they are in many ways, are not very rigidly biographical, but rather general political narratives. But with these exceptions we have nothing but praise for this excellent little book.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. LANG's introduction to the Border edition (Nimmo) of The Fair Maid of Perth, the last novel in which Scott's genius displayed itself unimpaired, is one of the best he has written—touched with true feeling for the great romancer. Mr. Macbeth's designs, which furnish the bulk of the etchings, are generally good, but unluckily the least satisfactory forms the frontispieces of the second volume.

We have on our table the following catalogues of London booksellers: Messrs. Bailey Bros. (fair), Messrs. Birt & Sons, Mr. Cooper, Messrs. Dulau (botany), Mr. Edwards, Messrs. Ellis & Elvey (two valuable catalogues), Mr. Galwey (good), Messrs. George & Son, Mr. Glaisher (two catalogues), Mr. Hartley, Mr. Higham (two catalogues), Mr. Jeffery (two catalogues), Mr. Lauser (British portraits, good), Mr. Maggs, Messrs. Maurice & Co., Mr. May (two catalogues), Messrs. Nichols & Co., Mr. Nutt, Messrs. Parsons & Sons (good), Messrs. Pearson & Co. (ballads and broadsides), Messrs. Rimell & Son, Mr. Skeffington, Messrs. Sotherton & Co. (two good catalogues), Mr. E. Spencer, Messrs. Suckling & Gallo-way, and Messrs. Williams & Norgate. We have also to acknowledge the catalogues of Mr. Cleaver, Messrs. Meehan (two good catalogues), and Mr. Pickering of Bath, Mr. Downing, Mr. Thistlewood, Mr. Wilson, and the Midland Education Company of Birmingham, Mr. Commis of Bournemouth, Mr. Toon of Brighton (interesting), Messrs. George's Sons of Bristol, Mr. Johnson of Cambridge, Mr. Murray of Derby, Mr. Baxendale (good), Mr. Brown (good), Mr. Clay (two good catalogues), and Messrs. Douglas & Foulis of Edinburgh, Mr. Teal of Halifax, Mr. Noble (Jacobite tracts) of Inverness, Mr. Miles of Leeds, Mr. Murray of Leicester, Mr. Howell, Messrs. Jaggard & Co., and Messrs. Young & Sons (two catalogues) of Liverpool, Mr. Sutton of Manchester, Mr. Thorne of Newcastle-on-Tyne, Mr. Murray of Nottingham, Mr. Thorp of Reading, Mr. Lawrence of Rugby, Miss Millard of Teddington, Mr. Pollard (Cornish works) of Truro, and Mr. Naunton of Great Yarmouth.

We have on our table Wills, and How not to Make Them, by B. W. West (Longmans).—Pictures of the World, pencilled by Clement Scott (Remington & Co.).—First Exercises on Latin Construction, by A. M. D. Du Pré (Relfe Brothers).—Flores Historiarum, a First Latin Reader, edited by W. Marsh and R. Steele (Rivington).—Horace: Satires and Epistles, edited by J. H. Kirkland, A.M. (Boston, U.S., Leach & Shewell).—Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome, Introduction and Notes by P. Hordern (Bell & Sons).—Questions on Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, by J. Lees (Relfe Brothers).—Methods of Pathological Histology, by C. von Kahlidon, translated by H. M. Fletcher, M.D. (Macmillan & Co.).—Law and Theory in Chemistry, by D. Carnegie (Longmans).—Psychology, Descriptive and Explanatory, by G. T. Ladd (Longmans).—The Scientific Basis of a Future State, by W. J. APOLLO IN PARIS.

TO THE FRENCH ACADEMY ON THE ELECTION OF M. J. M. DE NÉPÉE.

I.

SPINNA, roofs, and towers gleam in the sunset's glow
 Till Paris burns like some old poet-town
 That draws Apollo's radiant presence down
 By music mounting from his sons below:
 Methinks he greets you, fearless men who know
 His sons and guard them, lest their sire's renown
 Be dimmed when bastard fingers clutch the crown
 Of him, our Lord of light and lyre and bow.
 As when he scared the hordes who sacked old Rome
 That day he soared above his temple-dome
 When gods were fleeing the voices of the Vandals,
 I see him now whose song keeps heaven immortal;
 I see him now: he shines above your portal,
 Phœbus from golden curls to golden sandals!

II.

With limbs of light I see the song-god stand Flushing your roof! He knows your hands are strong Against his foes, the brazen-throated throng
 Whose breath is blight to beauty in every land;
 "Foes of my foes," saith he, "who dare withstand
 The great coarse voice that works my children wrong,
 Ye crown Hérédia with the crown of song
 Heedless of all save Art's divine command!
 He sings the past—the beauty that hath been:
 I love him, I—remembering those bright days
 Before the world grew grey of Vandal base,
 When gods might mix with men of godlike mien
 And maids with lovesome eyes of mortal sheen,
 Sweet goddesses of earth with Woman's ways:

III.

I love the song-born poet, for that he Loves only song—seeks for love's sake alone
 Shy Poésie, whose dearest bowers, unknown
 To feudaries of Fame, are known to me."
 So saith the god, in tones which seem to be
 That music of the sunset richly blown
 When sinks the sun-god from his sinking throne
 Within the burnished bosom of the sea.
 He soars away, a star in rosy air:
 But see! the memory of his presence there Lives where he stood. Yea, though a god hath fled,
 Leaving a fading memory scarce beholden,
 A true god's very shadow glimmers golden
 With lovelier light than mortal brows can shed.

ENVOY.

The poet sings what Nature dreaming saith,
 But still his bride is Art—that starry wife
 From shores where music of the gods is rife.
 She teaches him the strain that conquereth,
 Whether he touch the lyre, or breathe his breath
 Through flute of Phœbus or through Pan's wild file—
 Whether of Man he sing or Nature's life,
 Or shining sword beyond the dykes of death.

Yet, though he asks but this, the bride's acclaim—
 Though not Fame's trumpet nor the wraith of Fame
 Can give the bridegroom joy whose bride is Art—
 He grieves when bastard-brows are crowned with flowers

On New Parnassus, noisy as a mart,— Remembering Poésie within her bowers.

THEODORE WATTS.

MR. TREBELLAS.

THE sudden death at Deal on the 28th ult. of Mr. Walter Hawken Trebellas is a serious loss to all who take an interest in the history and antiquities of Cornwall.

He was the eldest son of Mr. J. Tabois Trebellas, the author of several tales in the Cornish dialect, and was born at Truro on July 10th, 1831. Like many other well-known Cornishmen he was educated in the old Truro Grammar School. He entered the War Office in 1855, and in 1866 succeeded to the post of Chief Military Draughtsman and Surveyor, which dates from 1720, and is therefore one of the oldest in the Civil Service. From this he retired in 1893.

He was a man of varied accomplishments, a writer, antiquary, and musician, as well as artist and collector of china and engravings; and his brightness and warmth of heart endeared him to a large circle of friends. To the general public he is best known by his excellent 'Guide to Cornwall' (Stanford), which has passed through many editions; but his 'Cornish Worthies' and numerous papers in the Transactions of the Royal Institute of Cornwall are valued by specialists. He wrote also 'China, its History and People,' 'A History of the Coast Defences of England,' the 'Horseguards Memoranda,' a 'History of the Fortifications of Malta,' and numerous articles in the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' the Nineteenth Century, the Journal of the Archaeological Institute, and in more than one of the art magazines. He had, when he died, just finished the first instalment of a detailed history of the Tower of London in its various aspects. This, it is hoped, will be published in due course.

THE 'ELECTRA' OF EURIPIDES.

May 28, 1894.

I HAVE just seen the review of my edition of the 'Electra' of Euripides in the Athenæum of the 19th inst. I am there charged with holding that dyptorip is the masculine form corresponding to the feminine dyptoripar. The gravity of the charge seems to justify a departure from the silence with which a review is generally received. The reviewer has strangely misunderstood my words. The note on line 168 calls attention to the fact that though dyptoripar (which I supposed every one would know came from dyptoripos) and not dyptoripar seems to be the correct reading in line 168, yet dyptorip (the fem. acc. of which is, of course, dyptoripar) occurs in line 462. The note seems to me to express the required meaning with sufficient clearness. I did not think that any of my possible readers would be ignorant, or could suppose the editor of a Greek play to be ignorant, of the respective inflexions of dyptorip and dyptoripos.

The other criticisms in the review involve no such serious charge as the above. I shall, therefore, merely remark with regard to the line

ὦ γῆς παλαιὸν Ἀργεὺς, Ἰνδύχου πόαι, that my conjecture, which is unfavourably criticized, at least gives a line that can be scanned—a merit which the reviewer's palaeographically ingenious conjecture, κινύχου for Ἰνδύχου, cannot claim, as it introduces a spondee in the fourth foot of a trimeter iambic line.

I cannot conclude without expressing my sense of the many kind and appreciative remarks that the review contains on my attempt to call attention to an unduly neglected play.

CHARLES H. KEENE.

. As we quoted Mr. Keene's note, we prefixed to our comment the only relevant defence which can be made to any charge based on that note. Moreover, if we thought that Mr.
 Keene's dyptoripar was his feminine form corresponding to dyptorip, what could we have meant by saying "the required sense 'rustic,' which Mr. Keene gives to dyptoripar, is only post-classical"? These words prove that we found fault with Mr. Keene for using the feminine of dyptoripos as the feminine to dyptorip, when vv. 11. gave the obvious dyptoripar. We are sorry he has misinterpreted our comment, and hope no other reader has done the same. We never assume that blunders, unless they are very frequent, are due to ignorance. For instance, if our afterthought κινύχου (v. 1) had been inadvertently suggested by an editor, we should have pounced upon the slip, without, however, imagining him ignorant of the scansion of senarii. If our criticism on dyptoripar was so obviously unjustifiable, why has not Mr. Keene reproduced his note and our comment?

'ENGLISH BARDS AND SCOTCH REVIEWERS.'

June 4, 1894.

IN answer to J. D. C.'s inquiries I write to tell him that the lines he quotes are as follows in the fifth edition:—

This—that—and t'other line seem incorrect.
 Whom Scotland pampers with her dery grain.
 This scents its pages, and that glids its rear.

As regards the Moore-Jeffrey duel, both notes are given in the fifth edition, in two consecutive but distinct paragraphs. The statement in the Athenæum (1831) that the first note was struck out of the fifth edition is incorrect.

JOHN MURRAY.

3, Lebanon Gardens, Wandsworth, June 4, 1894.

I SHOULD not again venture to trouble you if it were not that even the most meagre evidence may assist to build up a case, and enable us to get at the history of a series of counterfeits very disquieting to book-lovers.

My apologies are due for having stated that there were no water-marks in my 1810 copy of the fourth edition. More careful examination shows this copy to be identical with that described by J. D. C. in his letter of May 26th, each of the four sheets having the water-mark
 "G & R T" along the page, and obscured by the letterpress, instead of across the inner margin, where the "1818" mark appears in the third edition. It is interesting to note one or two of the many variations in the 1810 fourth edition, which is supposed to be a simple reprint of the third. Similar, but not identical, founts of type are used; the words "Third Edition," at the head of the preface, are in fancy letter in the one, and in italic capitals in the other; the spacing and making-up of lines are often different; and a curious error appears on p. 83 of the fourth edition, where the large-type headline is wrongly spelled "Postscript." All these tend to show, I fancy, that the fourth edition was reset throughout. J. D. C. thinks I shall find the fifth line of p. 76 appearing in all editions as:—

But when fair Isle rolls her purer wave.

The fourth edition has the line rightly printed,

But where fair Isle rolls her purer wave;

but in the third edition of 1810, water-marked "1818," the word "her" is left out by the printer, although there is no gap in the spacing.

Is this a variation from J. D. C.'s copy, and from the genuine third edition?

J. R. BAGGULEY.

Court Garden, Marlow, Bucks, June 2, 1894.

REFERRING to the remarks in to-day's Athenæum by J. D. C. on the fourth edition of Byron's 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' I have found in my library a copy of that edition dated 1810, published by James Cawthorn (alone). There is no water-mark on the paper; the lines are numbered by tens with frequent gaps, but between 810 and 840 comes 830; and the size of the page is 9 inches in length and 5½ inches wide, probably a large-paper copy of the book. In other respects it follows that described by J. D. C. ROBERT GRIFFIN.

P.S.—Since writing the above I see that in my copy George Lamb is called "ingenuous" and not "ingenious" (note to line 58).

77, Charing Cross Road.

It appears that I was mistaken in supposing that my copy of 'English Bards,' which is without a water-mark, is the genuine first edition. A few days ago I bought at Messrs. Sotheby's, in the Burgess sale, a copy of the real first edition, which has the water-mark of 1805. A comparison of this with my other copy reveals the fact that the latter is a palpable forgery, though an endeavour was evidently made to imitate the "get-up" of the genuine edition. From this it would appear that there are at least two counterfeit first editions—one without a water-mark, and the other with the water-mark of 1812. With regard to the fact that Mr. Murray's copy has the water-mark of 1804, while others have that of 1805, this is not, in my opinion, a proof that these were two separate issues, but only an indication that the printer began printing upon a stock of paper with the first date, which becoming exhausted, he proceeded to get a second supply with the later date upon it.

With regard to the question as to which is to be regarded as the genuine third edition, I think that the evidence we have at present is insufficient to determine the point. The fact that there is an edition with the water-mark of 1804 makes it slightly more probable that that, rather than any issue with a later date, is the original; but, of course, it may merely have been owing to the fact that the printer had a stock of paper in his possession which had been lying by for some years, as was, in fact, the case with the paper used for the first edition. It is altogether very singular that Byron's satire should have undergone such strange adventures.

BRETTAM DOBELL.

6, Seymour Road, Broad Green, Liverpool, June 4, 1894.

IN J. D. C.'s notes of last week re 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' writing of the third edition, he states that "the fifth line of p. 78 runs thus:—

But when fair Isis rolls her purer wave,
in all editions."

Now my copy of the "spurious" third edition, which seems almost identical with that of Mr. Bagguley—save that the water-mark is "Basted [not Brasted] Mill 1818"—does not bear out this assertion, but reads as follows:—

But where fair Isis rolls her purer wave.

A former owner of the book, possessed evidently of a correct ear for metre, has inserted in pencil "a" before "purer"; and I may add that this "spurious" third has, in common with the other two copies referred to, the misprint "crawl" for "scrawl" in l. 47, but is without any portrait. In the note, too, on George Lamb (l. 56) he is described as "ingenious" (not "ingenuous"); and again J. D. C. may be surprised to learn that l. 359 reads:—

If chance [not 'chance'] some hard, though once by dancer's [sic] feared.

Perhaps some of your readers might be able to state whether this "spurious" third is an English or Irish piracy. Is the water-mark "Basted Mill" any aid in tracing its origin? Let me state in conclusion my copy was acquired in a town in the north of England.

ROLAND J. A. SHELLEY.

AN UNKNOWN BALADE BY CHAUCER.

It has previously been my good fortune, on more than one occasion, to draw attention to poems by Chaucer that were previously unknown.

British naval history has some reason to boast of "the glorious first of June." It was a glorious day for me, as I spent it in consulting manuscripts in the British Museum, not without some good results.

In particular, I went carefully through the newly acquired MS. Addit. 34360, formerly MS. Phillips 9053, the very MS. which contains the unique ultimate stanza of the remarkable poem to which I have given the name of 'A Complaint to his Lady.' This MS. has been in the hands of Stowe, of Ritson, and of Sir Thomas Phillips; and the poem just mentioned was printed from it for the Chaucer Society. It is, therefore, almost inexplicable how the poem to which I now propose to draw attention has hitherto escaped observation. It has never been printed; and yet, all the while, any one who consults the MS. may see, staring him in the face on fol. 21, back (formerly p. 36), a title in large bold characters, not later than 1450, "Balade that Chaucer made."

I think I can account for it. It requires study and care to see how it goes. The metre is extremely intricate; the copy is carelessly written; and the sense is imperfect, owing to the loss of two leading words, and alas! in one place, of a whole line.

Internal evidence assigns it to Chaucer beyond doubt. It is the most complete example that exists of his mastery over the technicalities of rhythm. It comprises three stanzas, each of nine lines, in the difficult metre of a part of 'Anelida and Arcite.' But it surpasses anything found in that poem, because it actually exhibits only two rhyme-endings in the whole poem (exclusive of the Envoy).

A few such examples occur in Hoccleve. I once drew attention to this, and added that it was most unlikely that Hoccleve invented the metre for himself. I said that he certainly copied it from some poem by Chaucer which has not come down to us. And now, behold, here it is! It has come down to us, and we did not know it.

I now give an exact transcript, with all the faults in spelling of the unique original. However, I supply, within brackets, two words that are required to complete the sense and metre; and I similarly supply the missing line by slightly altering a line which occurs in Chaucer's 'Balade to Rosemounde':—

BALADE THAT CHAUCER MADE.

So hath my hert(e) caught in remembrance
Yowre beaute hole, and stidfast gouernance,
Yowre vertus al(e) and yowre hie noblesse,
That yow to acree is sette al my plesance.
So wel me likith yowre womanly continaunce,
Yowre frenche fetures and yowre couynesse,
That, whiles I live, myn hert to hie maystresse
Yow hath ful chose in trier [sic] perseverance
Newer to change, for no maner distresse.
¶ And sith I shal do [you] this obseruaunce
Al my live, withouten displeaunce,
Yow for to serve with al my beynesse,
[I pray yow, do to me som dilaunce.]
And have me somwhat in your conuenance.
My woful hert(e) suffirith grete duresse;
And [like] how humbly[e], with al symplece,
My wil I conforme to your ordinaunce,
As you best list my paynes for to redresse.
¶ Consol drying eke, how I hange in balance
In your service; such, los: is my chaunce,
Abiding grace, when that yowre gentillesse
Of my grete woo list do allegaunce,
And with yowre pite me som wise avaunce,
In ful rebuyng of myn hevynesse;
And thynkith be reason that womanly noblesse
Shuld nat desire for til do the outrance
Ther-as he fyndith non unbrukennesse.

LEMUOTE.

Anctour of norture, lady of plesaunce,
Shewsigne of beaute, floure of womanshede,
Take ye non hede into my ignoraunce,

But this receyvyth of yowre goodly hede;
Thynkyng that I have caught in remembrance
Yowre beaute hole, your stidfast gouernance.

Suggested emendations: 2. Your (for Yowre), throughout; hool. 3. alle (two syllables); hy. 4. est. 5. lykth. 7. herte (but the final e is very slight). 8. trew (elsewhere spelt trier). 11. Al my lyf (accout on Al). 14. couenance (remembrance, a beautiful and new word). 15. suffreth greet. 18. Omit for. 21. graces (two syllables); omit that. 22. allegaunce means alleviation. 25. Read, And thinkth resoun. 26. Read, desyre for to do; omit the. 29. Read, flour. 30. Tak; myn. 31. goodlihed. 33. hool. I suspect that, in l. 5, womanly is a substitution for wylly.

Note the delicate way in which the last two lines of the Envoy catch up the echo of the first two lines of the poem. There is nothing so harmonious in all English literature, except the parallel case in which the very same master repeats the line ending with the same word remembrance at the end of his 'Complaint of Anelida.' And this consideration clinches the whole matter, and precludes the possibility that the poem can be apurisy.

Literary Gossip.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING will remain in Wiltshire until the end of September, when he proposes to return to Vermont. He is at present engaged upon a series of four "Jungle Stories," of which the first has already appeared in the new series of the Pall Mall Budget. Also he is revising for the press a second series of his 'Barrack-Room Ballads,' which will be issued, if possible, before he leaves England. Further, in the intervals he is arranging another series of stories for publication in book form. But this may not appear before another volume which he has in contemplation—to consist entirely of stories which have not been issued in any periodical.

MR. STEVENSON has finished another novel, to be called 'St. Ives,' which relates the adventures of a French naval officer who was taken by one of King George's warships during the great French war, and was interned in a Scotch prison. He escapes, and some of his adventures are most extraordinary. It is not Mr. Stevenson's present intention, we understand, to publish this book for some months. Two-thirds of 'The Lord Justice-Clerk' are already written. This story deals with Scottish life in the latter half of the last century—a period which has never been well known to the ordinary students of history, although Mr. Stevenson has a surprisingly intimate acquaintance with it. Contrary to the usual precedent, these two tales will be published in three-volume form. Meantime, we understand there are at least two South Sea stories ready for the magazines.

'THE EMB-TIDE,' the last of the three novels in which Mr. Stevenson is to collaborate with his stepson, Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, will be published in a single volume early in the autumn. We understand that Mr. Osbourne is engaged on another story, similar in character to 'The Wreckers.'

THE reason for the interdict which until the end of last week was laid upon the sale of the Pall Mall Gazette in Turkey was that that journal had stated that "the Shadow of God upon Earth" was out of health. The Standard and the Daily News are still forbidden in the Sultan's dominions; but English residents in Constantinople and Smyrna, at any rate, can always read a copy by applying at the Consulate.

MR. GEORGE MOORE is now revising and in part rewriting three or four of his short stories which have already appeared in the periodical press. The new volume will probably include a condensed version of 'A Mere Accident,' which was first published as a one-volume novel. It is not often that an author thus cuts down his published work.

SEVERAL writers of repute are paid at the rate of twelve pounds a thousand words for their short stories; but no novelist, we believe, has received so much for his serial rights as the editors of the Pall Mall Magazine have paid Mr. George Meredith for 'Lord Ormont and his Ananta.' The price, it is said on the best authority, was ten pounds a thousand words.

MR. GILBERT PARKER is now at work upon a thorough revision of 'The Trail of the Sword,' which appeared in the Illustrated London News, and will be published in book form during the early autumn. He is also writing an account of his recent travels in Mexico and Cuba. This is to be first issued as a serial.

THERE is talk of a general meeting to be held this month in order to bring together as many as possible of those who are favourable to the scheme of the Gresham University Commission as a whole, and to urge the speedy appointment of the Statutory Commission. The arrangements are, we believe, in the hands of Prof. Ramsay, of University College. We hope that the conference will take heed to insist, as Prof. H. Sidgwick does in his note on the report, that the Commission shall be empowered to frame the university either in connexion with the present examining body or (if that scheme breaks down) on an independent basis as proposed before. The original Gresham charter could be modified and carried into effect much better through the Statutory Commission than by setting the machinery of the Privy Council in motion again.

WE are sorry to hear of the death of the Rev. Josiah Wright, whose translation of the 'Phædrus, Lysis, and Protagoras' first appeared in 1848, and is now included in the "Golden Treasury Series." Mr. Wright was educated at Trinity College, and was a Senior Optime and obtained a First Class in the Classical Tripos in 1846. His excellent version of three Platonic dialogues was undertaken at the suggestion of W. H. Thompson, then one of the tutors of Trinity, and owed a good deal to that great master of the art of translation. He became head master of Sutton Coldfield School, and published several school-books which enjoyed considerable success; two reading-books (one Greek and one Latin), called respectively 'Hellenica' and 'The Seven Kings of Rome'; also 'A Help to Latin Grammar,' 'First Latin Steps,' 'David, King of Israel,' &c. Mr. Wright took orders in 1863; and about twenty years ago he retired from Sutton Coldfield, and lived at St. Leonards-on-Sea.

MR. EDWARD CAFERN, "the postman poet," died on Tuesday last, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He was born in Devonshire, in which county in the early part of his life he was a letter-carrier. He published several volumes of verse which attracted considerable attention, and many years ago a Civil List pension was granted to him.

THE Earl of Pembroke is writing an introduction to a book of South Sea stories which Mr. Fisher Unwin is about to publish for an Australian writer. The scene of many of the exploits recorded in these stories is familiar to the earl, as well as to the many readers of the delightful volume in which Lord Pembroke collaborated with Dr. Kingsley half a generation ago.

MR. H. B. MARRIOTT-WATSON is now engaged upon 'The Adventures of Point Despair,' the New Zealand romance which was announced some time ago, and which will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson. Messrs. Mathews & Lane will also publish a volume of sketches and short stories from his pen in the course of the autumn.

WE understand that Mrs. Graham Tomson's new volume of verse may be expected in September.

MR. NISBET, the author of 'The Insanity of Genius,' who is dramatic critic of the Times and editor of the Morning, is going to contribute a series of articles to the Pall Mall Budget, to be entitled 'The Philosopher in Slippers.' Mr. G. S. Street will write 'The Reverses of a Reviewer,' Mr. William Archer is to furnish a weekly theatrical column, and Mr. Le Gallienne will discourse at large on the books of the week.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke has accepted an invitation to lecture at the Lowell Institute in the autumn. Mr. Brooke will leave for America in September, and does not return to England till about Christmas. This is his first visit to America.

THE Manchester City News announces the decease of Lieut.-Col. Paul Frederick De Quincey, the son and last surviving male descendant of Thomas De Quincey. Col. De Quincey was born at Grasmere on November 26th, 1828, and died at Auckland, New Zealand, on April 15th.

CARDINAL MORAN, Archbishop of Sydney, has completed a large 'History of the Catholic Church in Australasia.' It will be published simultaneously in Australia and in England before the close of the year.

THE Rev. E. C. Channer writes from Ravensthorpe Vicarage, Northampton:—

"The reviewer of 'Church Folk-lore' asks about the presence of parents at weddings. I have officiated at many in Devon, Essex, London, and Northants, and never knew the parents come except in the class in which the bride comes in white. The party consists of bride and bridegroom, bridesmaid (sister of bridegroom or bride), and giver-away, preferably unmarried brother of bride. A wedding is considered a young people's affair, at which older persons are out of place. The bridegroom's relations (except bridesmaid or giver-away) do not attend the festivities. Their appearance marks a desire to be genteel; but even then his parents do not come. I suppose in all classes the bridegroom's parents dislike the match. The bride's mother is cooking the wedding dinner, and the father is too shy to appear at church. The men (if perfectly sober) are much shyer and more nervous than the women; I think because they are less accustomed to a clergyman or gentleman. Have you heard the saying, current in North Northants, that if the bride comes to church a maid the steeple will bow to her?"

PROF. SWETE is printing at the University Press some lectures on 'The Apostles' Creed: its Relation to Primitive Christianity,' delivered at Cambridge during last Lent Term, and bearing on the controversy recently raised in Prussia by Prof. Harnack.

MR. EDWARD BOK, the editor of the Ladies' Home Journal of Philadelphia, which is said to enjoy a monthly circulation of 700,000 copies, has been in this country to arrange for the publication in his magazine of works by several English authors. He has planned a series to be entitled 'Women who have Influenced Me.' Mr. Gladstone was asked to contribute, and we hear that he has consented.

MR. RENDEL HARRIS writes to us to say that we are mistaken in supposing that he is going to contribute to the forthcoming volume of "Anecdota Oxoniensia," containing fragments of Palestinian Syriac.

THE Félibres are going to indulge in more elaborate fêtes this year. They are to begin at Lyons on the 9th of August, and to finish at the fountain of Vaucluse on the 15th of August. On Saturday, the 11th, the Comédie Française will act 'Œdipe Roi,' and on Sunday, the 12th, 'Antigone,' at the Roman theatre at Orange.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS purpose to issue in the autumn, in the same form as the French edition, and at about the same price, an edition of 'The Three Musketeers,' with the illustrations by M. Maurice Leloir, which were published last year by M. Calmann Lévy.

THE death of Prof. C. H. Pearson has removed one who promised at one time to hold a high position among English historians. In the sixties, when he published his history of the 'Early and Middle Ages in England' and his 'Historical Maps of England,' he enjoyed a very high reputation, and he proved a successful teacher at King's College, London, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. An amiable, kindly man, he was his own most severe critic, and often forgot that "le mieux est l'ennemi du bien"; and this, combined with delicate health and a certain restlessness of disposition, led him to abandon the career he had marked out for himself and emigrate to Australia, where eventually he entered on political life, and became Minister of Public Instruction in Victoria. On his return to England he gained the ear of the general public, in a way he had never done in his professorial days, by his remarkable work 'National Life and Character,' which appeared last year and excited much discussion. Before he emigrated Prof. Pearson was an occasional contributor to this journal.

MR. G. S. STREET's book, 'From the Autobiography of a Boy,' which appeared in the National Observer (under Mr. Henley's editorship), will be published by Messrs. Mathews & Lane about the end of next week.

AT the dinner of the Authors' Club last week, which brought together a large company, who seemed to be tolerably happy in spite of the continued existence of publishers, Mr. Leslie Stephen foretold "the coming of that glorious time" when writers will be better paid than they are now. The prophecy excited, on the whole, more doubt than belief. We hear, however, that a new literary agency is in process of formation, with a large capital behind it, which will employ its own readers, and pay authors a sum down as soon as it has approved their works. One of its chief objects will be to force up the average price of serial rights.

At the dinner given to him by the contributors to the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' Mr. Smith made a happy speech full of genuine feeling and in excellent taste. Mr. Lee as the chairman showed a power of oratory we had hardly expected of him, and Dr. Thompson and Mr. Justice Mathew added by their speeches to the success of the evening.

It is stated that Mr. Robert Clark, of the well-known printing firm of R. & R. Clark, of Edinburgh, whose death was recently announced, has left personal estate valued at 163,164l.

A rising Ethiopic scholar, Dr. P. Johannes Bachmann, died last week at the comparatively early age of thirty-two years. He was the author of an Ethiopic chrestomathy, and editor of the 'Corpus Juris Abessinorum,' and a part of the Minor Prophets in Ethiopic, which forms a continuation of Prof. Dillmann's edition of the 'Pentateuch and the First Prophets,' 1871.

M. OCTAVE MIRBEAU, the well-known Parisian critic, to whom M. Masterlinck owes the title of "the Belgian Shakespeare," has been in London, and will contribute to an English newspaper a series of articles detailing his impressions.

IN our note last week concerning Elizabeth Martian, wife of George Reade of Virginia, we should have said that she was the great-great-grandmother of George Washington. SCIENCE

Man the Primeval Savage: his Haunts and Relics from the Hill-tops of Bedfordshire to Blackwall. By Worthington G. Smith. (Stanford.)

As early as 1878 Mr. Worthington Smith began to notice and record the discovery of palaeolithic implements and flakes in various parts of London and its neighbourhood, and to observe that they formed part of a thin stratum of flint. By 1883 he had given this stratum of flint the apt and ingenious name of a "palaeolithic floor." Its geological situation carried it back to the close of the period of deposit of the river gravels; its wide extent suggested how numerous must have been the population which then swarmed into the district from the continent of Europe, prior to the formation of the English Channel; and its contents offered some indication of the degree of humanization they had attained. A single day at Dunstable in 1884 yielded Mr. Smith a palaeolithic flake, and the next year found him settled there as a resident. Isolated discoveries rewarded his patient research, but it was not till March, 1890, that he was able to establish the existence of a palaeolithic floor in that district also. This has resulted in the preparation of the volume before us, of which more than half consists of a description of the objects recovered, leaving little to be desired in respect of clearness and accuracy, and forming one of the most interesting and satisfactory records of cultured observation that have been given to the public.

An excellent archaeological map of the district for three or four miles round, which is rich in remains of its successive occupants, containing British huts, roads, and earthworks, and crossed by the Watling Street and the Icknield Way, serves to guide the reader, and 242 well-drawn illustrations by the author adorn the book and help the student. About one-sixth of these are reproductions of those appended to Mr. Smith's paper in the Journal of the Anthropological Institute for 1884.

The implements called palaeolithic are, as is well known, the most ancient relics of human industry, and the earliest discovered evidences of human existence. Man doubtless existed and had acquired the upright position long before he invented the art of working flints. He would probably fling naturally formed or fractured lumps of stone against his animal enemies for many generations before it would occur to him to break the stones so as to adapt them to various purposes. It has been, indeed, suggested that there was a stage in man's history, going back into vast distances of geological time, when he had so far got on the scent of making tools as roughly to chip blocks of stone without giving them any determinate form; but the evidence of this is not conclusive as yet. We may take Mr. Smith's discoveries, therefore, as relating to primeval man, in the sense that palaeolithic man is the earliest human being who has left anything behind him from which we can infer the sort of man he was. Speculation as to his precursors or predecessors can be nothing but guesswork. Between his first appearance and the development of the further idea of polishing the fractured stones by neolithic man, who is quite a modern person in comparison, a long period of time elapsed.

Mr. Smith is the fortunate possessor of a flint implement picked up at Dallow Farm near Luton by Mr. William Gutteridge, so far back as 1830, which is thus third in the order of discoveries, having only been preceded by the Gray's Inn implement of 1690 and Mr. Frere's Hoxne flints, described by him with so much foresight in the thirteenth volume of Archæo- logia. Mr. Gutteridge noted this implement as a curiosity and marked the locality and date on it seventeen years before Boucher de Perthes published his discoveries in France.

The objects found by Mr. Smith on and above the palaeolithic floor, which itself is now surmounted by about 8 feet (and sometimes more) of brick earth and red clay drift, are lustrous, white, sharp-edged, leaf-shaped implements, flakes trimmed on one side, scrapers, and side scrapers; grey and indigo variegated sharp-edged implements of like types; implements to which new points have been made by fresh flaking in later times; thin and delicately made scraper-like knives; tools of every variety of shape, in which the natural conformation of the mass of flint has been taken advantage of; hammer stones, punches, &c. The great number and variety of forms, and the care displayed in adapting them to use, may serve as indications of the variety of wants which primeval man had learnt to form, and of the mental activity with which he was able to minister to them. That Mr. Smith had lighted at Caddington upon the actual spot where implements had been manufactured in palaeolithic times is shown by his success in replacing the flakes upon the cores from which they had been struck off. In this way he dealt with not fewer than 2,259 flakes and blocks, and with infinite labour recovered and rejoined the pieces of implements that had been broken in palaeolithic times, and reattached flakes that had been struck off in the manufacture of implements. The evidence of the tools seems, he thinks, to indicate that the workers went away suddenly, and left their weapons and tools, finished and unfinished, as they were in the act of making and using them. He suggests that they might have been terrified by some unusually violent storm, which brought wind, rain, and deep flooding, or perhaps that they might have been quickly and extensively destroyed by some fatal pestilence in the style of the "Black Death" of the time of Edward III. No bones and no shells have been discovered in connexion with these large stores of flint implements, and the evidence of their antiquity rests, therefore, upon their geological position under the contorted drift otherwise called "warp and trail."

While the description of his finds is the more instructive part of the work, the portion which will more attract the reader is probably that in which Mr. Smith seeks to reproduce palaeolithic man and to describe his personal appearance and his manners and customs as the probabilities of the case present them to the mind of the author. Here he is not upon the same sure ground. Where no one can know, every one is at liberty to suppose what he pleases, and Mr. Smith's description of primeval man is necessarily largely drawn from fancy. He suggests that articulate speech had not yet been acquired, and that man's voice was then but a jabber, a shout, a roar. This may certainly be doubted. On the other hand, he thinks that the art of procuring fire was known. He suggests, and probably with truth, that in person the palaeolithic people resembled the hairy Ainos of Japan, and describes them as shorter in stature, bigger in the belly, broader in the back, less upright, and with less calf to the legs than the people of the present day; he fails, however, to carry out his idea in the illustrations he gives. The alleged hairiness is reduced to little more than an indication of a moustache on the cheeks of the ladies, who are drawn as rather handsome and well developed. So also, in his illustrations of the manner of holding chopping tools, the hands have neatly trimmed nails, such as palæolithic man is not likely to have displayed. Though Mr. Smith allows primeval man the use of fire, he supposes him to have been ignorant of the art of cookery, and draws gruesome pictures of bloody stains round the mouth and on the hands, and of the putrid food which he thinks formed the staple nourishment. Here we incline to think he is wrong; we are not so certain that primeval man knew how to procure fire, but cookery was probably even an earlier human accomplishment, and food dried in the sun would be more palatable than raw or semi-putrid flesh. The possession of sharp knives itself suggests a knowledge of the art of cookery, and the various forms of scraper and other implements adapted to different uses indicate a variety of wants and a considerable degree of ingenuity in devising means to supply them. Mr. Smith speculates somewhat at large on the sexual relations of palæolithic man, and is very likely not far from accurate in his descriptions of them; but some of the details might certainly have been spared in a book for general reading. All things considered, however, we have to thank him for a work which not only contains a valuable technical record of a long course of patient and minute exploration, but is also a lifelike and vivid description of the mode of living of our long-distant predecessors.

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH.

THE Report of the Astronomer Royal, which was read to the Board of Visitors at the Royal Observatory on Saturday last and is now before us, speaks of several important changes in the buildings and instrumental equipment, some of which have been carried out and others are as yet only in preparation. The south wing of the Physical Observatory in the extreme south of the Observatory enclosure was at length completed, after many delays, on April 20th, and is now in a state of preparation for occupation. But the building of the north wing and the completion of the central octagon by the addition of a story and the erection of the 30-foot Lassel dome over it, which were authorized more than a year ago, have not yet been commenced, though it is understood that tenders for the work have been invited, and it is hoped that there will not be much further delay in providing this much-needed extension, the plans of which have been carefully elaborated. Those of the building for the new universal transit-circle, or altazimuth, have been also prepared under the supervision of the Director of Works, and Mr. Christie hopes the operations may be commenced very shortly.

The new 28-inch refractor has been brought into working order, after much time spent in the erection of the instrument, in the adjustment of the object-glass, and in the provision of various fittings at the eye-end, which were not supplied until the close of February. The object-glass, however, had been mounted at the end of July, 1893, and after some alterations found necessary was finally adjusted on the 1st of October, when trial was made of its definition under good atmospheric conditions, which showed it to be very fine, and this was fully confirmed by other tests made subsequently, though last winter was not, on the whole, favourable for observations with large aperture. Reference has already been made in the Athenæum to Sir Henry Thompson's munificent offer of 5,000*l.* to provide a large photographic telescope with accessories, to serve as a complement to the 28-inch visual telescope. This has been readily accepted by the Admiralty, and, after careful consideration and discussion, a photographic telescope of 26 in. aperture and 22½ ft. focal length, equatorially mounted, was ordered of Sir H. Grubb on May 5th. The instrument, which is to be completed in eighteen months, will be erected on the central tower of the new Physical Observatory, under the 30-ft. dome shortly to be placed there, and will carry the 12½-in. Merz refractor as a guiding telescope and the Thompson 9-in. photoheliograph. It will thus be mounted under very favourable conditions, and will be in every respect a most effective instrument. The mounting of the half-prism spectroscope on the 28-in. telescope has been delayed on account of its being found necessary to remount the Dallmeyer photoheliograph on this telescope in the position which the spectroscope would occupy, in order to carry on the daily photographic record of the sun during the building operations in the south ground. When the final mounting, now in progress, is completed, this powerful instrument will be available for the work for which it was specially intended, viz., the spectroscopic determination of motions of stars in the line of sight.

The sun, moon, planets, and fundamental stars have been, as usual, regularly observed on the meridian, and, owing principally to the fine weather which prevailed during a great part of the year, an exceptionally large number of observations was obtained. The annual catalogue of stars observed in 1893 contains 2,758 objects. The moon has been observed with the altazimuth on the same system as in preceding years, the whole number of places obtained being 76, or 5·8 per lunation, whilst that on the meridian was 120, or 9·9 per lunation. Comets, occultations of stars by the moon, and other casual phenomena have been observed when practicable; and Mr. Lewis obtained a series of observations of double stars with the 12½-in. Merz refractor mounted on the Lassel equatorial, in continuation of those in the preceding year.

Satisfactory progress has been made with the photographic mapping of the heavens, a large number of photographs having been taken with the astrographic equatorial, under the superintendence of Mr. Criewick, some star-clusters and comets also having been specially photographed. Spectroscopic observations have been intermitted during the past year, the mounting of the spectroscope on the new 28-inch refractor having been delayed as already mentioned. But the photoheliographs have been regularly employed in photographing the solar surface under the direction of Mr. Maunder. In the year 1893 this was done on 216 days, and photographs taken at Mauritius and in India supplied the gaps to such an extent that a record of the state of the sun's surface was photographed on 359 out of the 365 days of the year. The solar activity was fully maintained throughout the year; but, so far as the present has yet advanced, there has been a distinct falling off both in the numbers of the groups of spots and in the mean daily spotted area.

Mr. Ellis retired from the Observatory at the end of last year, and the Magnetic and Meteorological Department was then placed under the charge of Mr. Nash, who had long been connected with it. The following particulars respecting the meteorology of the year may be of interest. The mean temperature of 1893 was 51°·1, being 1°·6 above the average for the fifty years 1841-90. During the twelve months ending April 30th, 1894, the highest air temperature in the shade exceeded 80° on twenty-eight days; the highest reading attained of all was 95°·1 on August 18th. The lowest was 12°·8 on January 5th, on which day the highest reached was only 19°·0, and the mean temperature 15°·9. The mean daily motion of the air in 1893 was 270 miles, being eleven miles below the average of the previous twenty-six years. The greatest daily motion in the twelve months ending April 30th, 1894, was 942 miles on February 11th, and the least was forty miles on July 15th. The exceptionally large pressures of 37 lb. and 35 lb. on the square foot were registered on December 12th and February 11th respectively. The number of hours of bright sunshine recorded during 1893 by the Campbell-Stokes sunshine instrument was 1,454, the greatest number on record since the commencement of the registration in 1877. As the sun was above the horizon altogether during 4,454 hours, this is expressed by the fraction 0·326, as compared with constant sunshine represented by unity. The rainfall for 1893 was 20·1 inches, being 4·4 inches below the average of the fifty years 1840-90. From March 1st to September 30th (the period of the great drought) the rainfall amounted to only 7·77 inches, while the average for those months in the same fifty years was 14·22 inches.

The only new extraneous work undertaken during the year was a determination (intended to be repeated) of the difference of longitude between the Greenwich and Liverpool observatories. Some further discussion has taken place respecting a discordance in the difference of longitude between Paris and Greenwich as determined by the French and the English observers respectively.

Mr. Turner resigned the post of Chief Assistant (which he had held for nearly ten years) on February 28th, having been appointed Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford; and Mr. F. W. Dyson, of Trinity College, Cambridge, was appointed his successor at Greenwich on March 1st. Some other changes have taken place, and the two vacancies in the staff of second-class assistants have not yet been filled up. Mr. Christie concludes his report by inviting attention to the desirability of some reorganization of the staff, as the work of the Observatory continues to increase, and was last year exceptionally heavy.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—May 31.—Lord Kelvin, President, in the chair, followed by Sir J. Evans, Treasurer.—The following papers were read: 'Propagation of Magnetization of Iron as affected by the Electric Currents in the Iron,' by Dr. J. Hopkinson and Mr. E. Wilson; 'On the Electrification of Air,' by Lord Kelvin and Mr. M. Maclean; 'Note on the Possibility of obtaining a Unidirectional Current to Earth from the Mains of an Alternating Current System,' by Mr. P. Cardew; 'On the Effect of Magnetization upon the Dimensions of Iron Rings in Directions perpendicular to the Magnetization, and upon the Volume of the Rings,' by Mr. S. Bidwell; 'On Rapid Variations of Atmospheric Temperature, especially during Föhn, and the Methods of observing Them,' by Mr. J. Y. Buchanan; 'The Effect of Mechanical Stress and of Magnetization on the Physical Properties of Alloys of Iron and Nickel and of Manganese Steel,' by Mr. H. Tomlinson; and 'The Root of Lycopodium obscurum (Williamson),' by Mr. W. C. Williamson and Mr. D. H. Scott.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—May 31.—Sir A. W. Franks, President, in the chair.—The President read an address with reference to the Heraldic Exhibition and the chief objects of interest contained therein.—Mr. Rerard Green communicated an account of Wriothesley's Tournament Roll of 1510, which has been lent by the Heraldic College to the exhibition.—The President read a paper on early heraldic book-plates and heraldic engravings, illustrated by a fine series of examples.—Mr. W. H. St. John Hope read a paper descriptive of the helm and crest, shield, surcoat, &c., from the Black Prince's tomb, exhibited by the courtesy of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. Mr. Hope specially called attention to the omission of the label for cadency on the crest, shield, and surcoat, which could only be accounted for on the supposition that the relics were those of Edward III., and not of his son, perhaps hung up by the king's order as a mark of his deep affection.

PHILOLOGICAL.—June 1.—Prof. Skeat, V.P., in the chair.—The following resolution, proposed by Prof. Skeat, and supported by Dr. Furnivall and Mr. H. Bradley, who all spoke feelingly in praise of the late Dr. Morris as a scholar and a man, was unanimously passed: "This meeting of the Philological Society desires: 1. To record its deep sense of the great loss which Teutonic and Pali philology has suffered by the lamented death of the late Dr. Richard Morris; and 2. To offer its sympathy and condolence to Dr. Morris's widow and family."—The Honorary Secretary announced that the Council had elected Prof. Napier a Vice-President of the Society in the place of Dr. Morris, and Mr. H. H. Gibbs an ordinary Member of Council in Prof. Napier's place.—Dr. W. Stokes read a paper by Prof. Strachan, 'Contributions to the History of the Deponent Verb in Irish.' The object of the paper was: 1. To ascertain the extent to which the r deponent prevailed in Old Irish; 2. To fix as accurately as possible the date of its disappearance in the deponent verbs; and 3. To investigate the starting-point and development of new deponent forms, such as the second sing. pres. indic. in air, ir, ir.—Prof. Skeat then read and commented on the new "Balado that Chaucer made," which he had just found, and which is given on a prior page in the present number of the Athenæum.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—May 29.—Annual General Meeting.—Mr. A. Giles, President, in the chair.—The Report and accounts having been adopted, the ballot for Council took place, and resulted in the election of Sir R. Rawlinson as President; Sir B. Baker, Mr. J. W. Barry, Mr. W. H. Preece, and Sir D. Fox as Vice-Presidents; and Dr. W. Anderson, A. E. Binnie, W. R. Galbraith, J. H. Greathead, Sir C. A. Hartley, J. C. Hawkshaw, C. Hawksley, Dr. A. B. W. Kennedy, Sir B. Leslie, J. Mansergh, Sir G. Moleworth, Sir E. J. Reed, W. Shelford, F. W. Webb, and Dr. W. H. White as other Members of Council.—The session was then adjourned to November 13th.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—June 4.—Sir J. Crichton-Browne, Treas. and V.P., in the chair.—The Duchess of Marlborough, H. H. Prince Duple Singh, Sir G. Barclay Bruce, Sir T. D. Gibson-Carmichael, Major-General E. R. Festing, Capt. F. L. Nathan, Messrs. F. Dye, L. H. Lindley, C. E. Peck, and H. Walsham were elected Members.

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHEOLOGY.—June 5.—Mr. P. le P. Renouf, President, in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On an Unknown Aramaic Version of Theodotus of Rome, of the Song of the Three Children,' by Dr. M. Gaster, and 'Was Ninip "the Most High God" of Jerusalem?' by Mr. T. G. Pinches.

ARISTOTELIAN.—May 21.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Papers were read by Mr. H. W. Carr, Mr. G. D. Hicks, and Prof. Alexander 'On the Nature and Range of Evolution.'

June 4.—The President in the chair.—The Report and accounts for the fifteenth session were adopted, and the officers for the ensuing session elected as follows: President, Mr. B. Bosanquet; Vice-Presidents, Prof. Alexander, Mr. Boutwood, and Mr. G. F. Stout; Editor, Mr. A. F. Shand; Honorary Secretary, Mr. H. W. Carr.—A paper was read by Dr. W. L. Gildes 'On the Immateriality of the Rational Soul.'—The paper was followed by a discussion.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL.—May 21.—Mr. R. C. Christie in the chair.—Mr. E. Almack read a paper 'On the Bibliography of "Eikon Basilike." Beginning with a review of the evidence in favour of the authorship of Charles himself, which he considered immensely stronger than any claims which could be put forward for that of Bishop Gauden, Mr. Almack then gave a brief account of the circumstances of the book's publication, showing that, despite all the attempts of Cromwell to suppress it, it was newly set up and printed about forty times within a year of the king's execution. Lists were handed round to show how it was proposed to distinguish these different editions in Mr. Almack's forthcoming bibliography, and the paper was illustrated by the exhibition of a very fine collection of 'Eikons,' the property of the reader.—Mr. Christie raised some points in favour of Dr. Gauden's authorship, and the discussion was continued by Mr. H. B. Wheatley and others.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Library Association, 5.—Music in the Public Libraries, Mrs. C. A. Webster. 'A Village Public Library, Claydon, Suffolk,' Sir E. Verney.
Tues. Institute of British Architects, 8.—The Kensington-Tawarth of Bobbin Hall, Mr. H. Reynolds.
Wed. Society of Architects, 8.—Election of Members, 'The Threemasted temple of Philia,' Major F. A. Leslie.
Thurs. Anthropological Institute, 8.—Rhynchographical Notes on the Halls of the Congo Basin, Mr. H. Ward.
Weds. United Service Institution, 3.—The Differentiation of Naval Forces a Comparison, Mr. H. L. Swinburne.
Thurs. Mathematical, 8.—The Solution of Two Differential Equations, Mr. F. H. Jackson. 'A Theorem in Isoperimetry,' Mr. A. R. Johnson. 'Properties of a certain Circle,' Mr. E. Tucker. 'Note on Four Special Circles of Intersection of a System of Generalized Inward Circles of a Plane Triangle,' Mr. J. Griffiths. 'On the Order of the Minimum of Two or more Equations,' Dr. H. Lachlan.
Fri. Antiquaries, 8.—Methods used in Making and Ornamenting an Egyptian Rock Tomb, Mr. A. Chute. 'Recent Excavations in Montenegro,' Mr. J. A. Murray. 'The Chapel of the Blessed Virgin beside the Cloister at Wells,' Mr. R. Hurdis.
Sat. Zoological, 4.—Sketches in Geographical Distribution, Mr. F. A. Boddard.

Science Society.

MEMRS. KEGAN PAUL & Co. are about to issue immediately, as a new volume of the "International Scientific Series," a work on 'Race and Language,' by Prof. André Lefèvre, of the Anthropological School in Paris. The author surveys the distribution of races and languages, with especial reference to the Indo-European type.

The Turkish Government has directed the publication of a manual of telegraphy in Turkish for its telegraphists and the public.

The death is announced of Mr. William Spence. He was born in London in 1816, was a patent agent, and for many years wrote in professional papers on patent legislation.

FINE ARTS

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(Fourth Notice.—Portraits and Landscapes.)

We may now conclude our remarks on the portraits in this exhibition, beginning with the contributions of some artists who do not contribute other works in oil to this exhibition. The first of these is Mr. A. S. Cope, whose Lord Roberts (No. 3), a modest example, is sincerely painted, and commendable for its flesh and tonality, but rather deficient in insight and vigour of conception. A much better work in all respects is The Right Hon. A. J. Mundella (339), which, except for a certain furtive and treacherous look in the severe eyes, is all that could be desired. The flesh painting is among the best in the Academy.—Mr. Ouleas's Sir F. Grenfell (15) is vigorous and full of character, but the attitude and expression are rather more demonstrative than becomes the subject; the surface is rougher and the painter's touch not so light as formerly. Mr. Ouleas exhibits five other portraits, and is therefore, though not, perhaps, wisely, quite within his right this year. Of these Sir W. Saxory (191), while justly characteristic as a likeness, is the least good. Nor can we profess to care much for J. Stirling, Esq. (464), although, not being a "presentation portrait," it must have been comparatively pleasant to paint; of all drudgery surely nothing, not even the sitting for it, can be duller than painting a "presentation portrait." Sir J. Gladstone (505), on the other hand, is a sterling piece of work, and there is more in it than meets the eye.—Mr. Wells would seem to be Mr. Ouleas's counterpart in the Academy, but not his rival or superior. He has produced a "presentation portrait" of unusual spirit in J. O. Phillips, Esq. (21), a life-size, three-quarters-length figure, seated in a chair. Mr. Wells's is a capital, simple, and veracious kind of painting, of which, however, it would have been sufficient to have had fewer than the seven moderately good specimens which are now before us. Of these Miss Stirling (54) is, perhaps, the best, and not unmarked by the influence of Mr. Sargent, or rather of his master, M. Carolus Duran. The lady wears a cream-coloured satin dress, the painting of which has proved more attractive to the artist than the lady herself, whose carnations are somewhat heavily touched, opaque, and deficient in purity, as well as in that rosy clearness which ladies most desire for their skins. Although the arms are ill drawn, Mrs. W. E. Laurie (158) is animated and acceptable; indeed, the sweetness and naturalness of the face would redeem much worse faults than that.—Turning now to the figure painters who are also portrait painters, we start with Mr. Sargent, although Miss Chandler (61), a life-size portrait, is, despite the capital painting of the black gown, the least admirable of his portraits that we know of. The drawing of the face is questionable, and the carnations cruder than ladies like.—On the other hand, Mr. S. Lucas's A. C. Harmsworth, Esq. (72), is extremely academic, rather coarse, and very clever, but a piece of desirable art.—Mr. Herkomer is sometimes one of the most fortunate of portrait painters; at other times he is wholly unsuccessful, and this season he has proved the truth of this remark completely. He has produced no finer instance of his ability (nor any so unmistakably marked by a sense of humour, not to say fine insight and wit) than the Marquess of Ripon (110), wearing on his features an expression of satisfaction such as might have pervaded them after he had achieved that Alabama Treaty which procured him his marquise. Rough as it is, this is a noteworthy piece of painting, and in good keeping, although the colouring is commonplace. But, unluckily, Mr. Herkomer contributes seven pictures, of which four would have been plenty. They are not all portraits, unless the big naked model we noticed with qualified admiration the other day is taken, as it ought to be, as such. The contrast between the Marquess of Ripon and the Marquess of Salisbury, whom Mr. Herkomer painted in No. 223, may well have added zest to both tasks; and although No. 223 is not to be compared with Sir John Millais's portrait of the same statesman, which is not, however, Sir John's masterpiece, it is a good study, if not so good as No. 110. No. 14, C. Thomas, Esq., is pleasantly characteristic, but slight; while Sir W. J. Farrer (519) is one of Mr. Herkomer's successes, sober, characteristic, animated, without attitudinizing, and, though a little thin, good throughout. Less so is Sir H. Wiggins (815).—Like his brother Academician, Mr. Sant is an unequal and somewhat erratic painter of portraits, and though not more accomplished, he is better trained, but rather weaker, and fonder of prettiness and superfine motives. Well drawn and broadly painted, his Lady Smyth (115) reminds us in some respects of a good Reynolds of Sir Joshua's middle period. But, unfortunately, the flesh painting is rather opaque. Mrs. G. Leather (182), dressed in pale amber satin, would be better if the carnations were brighter and clearer. Chic of a prosaic sort pervades it, and it is as deft as it is slight.—The Portrait of a Gentleman (122), by Mr. R. L. Owtram, is really such a capital piece, vigorous, painted in deep, full tones, in a low chromatic scheme, and throughout in harmony with itself.—Mr. Orchardson's Prof. Deussen (176) is a bright but unplesing likeness, very thinly painted, abounding in chic of a sort which is more characteristic of the artist than desirable for his reputation, or likely to increase the confidence of those who think a portrait-painting Academician cannot work in a factitious manner. In fact, this is a portrait it is impossible to praise; its showiness is the Nemesis of much mere cleverness. Again, there is chic of a very bold and accomplished sort, or, to use an obsolete term of criticism, "brio," in Mr. Orchardson's dashing, yet fallacious Portrait of a Lady (234).—There is too much paint and rather unrefined treatment in Miss M. Porter's Lady Miles (288), still the face is good.

Contrasting strongly, and much to its advantage, with its neighbour by Mr. Herkomer (340), Sir G. Reid's Prof. Blackie (343) is quite equal to any Raeburn, and very much better than most of them. The head, attitude, expression, homogeneity in bright, but low tints, and excellent rendering of daylight are first-rate qualities of this first-rate picture, which is by a great deal the best of the artist's portraits known to us.—Absurdly slight and pretentious is Mr. G. Thompson's S. Mitford, Esq. (432), yet its rendering of character and spontaneity are excellent.—A most depressing and inane female figure is Mr. M. Greiffenhagen's Portrait of a Lady (448), and it is depressingly painted, for there is nothing to redeem the dirtiness of its pigments—of colours, as such, it can be said to have none, nor amid the grimy gloom of it can we discover anything fit to be called drawing or modelling.

We now turn to the landscapes that remain to be noticed. Mr. Sant appears as a commendable landscape painter of an old-fashioned sort in Almwick Castle (738), and, with more prettiness, in A Pastoral (146).—Mr. W. A. Toplis's brilliant, well-drawn, and solid, but hard picture of a natural archway of slate rocks in Nature's Architecture, Sark (7), has a sunlit pure sea for its background. It reminds us of M. Robinet's pictures, but it is harder.—Daybreak (8), by Mr. T. H. McLachlan, will be looked at with pleasure.—Mr. T. S. Cooper, whose vitality is a wonder for his age, exhibits several good qualities in "At even, when the sun is low" (9), where a herd of cattle cross a narrow ancient bridge. "The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats" (71) comes from the same still firm and laborious hand. The execution indicates the resources of the painter, or rather lets us into some of the secrets of his studio. The Noonday Rest (204) is exactly what Mr. Cooper was painting when his critics were beginning to learn to draw. When they began to paint he was still in the stage of his snow-piece, here called Through the Glen in a Snowdrift (517), which is learned, firmly finished, hard as marble, while as pure in light and colour, and, despite that mechanical style to which the painter adheres without deviation, full of resource.—In Mr. E. T. Compton's Mountains of Valpeltine (10) the studiously well-modelled hills and their countless peaks clad in snow are noticeable. On the other hand, the colouring is cold, and innumerable details are crowded together without a dominant feature.—Much richer in colour, simpler, and more massive in its composition and effect, and therefore grander, is Mr. W. B. Gardner's The Devil's Punch Bowl (11), a capital picture.—Mr. E. A. Waterlow's Cloudy June (14) depicts, with plenty of harmonious colour and clear warm tones, an old stone bridge over a quick smooth stream, a grand mass of elms, and huge low-lying clouds,—

With ragged rims of thunder brooding low,
And shadow streaks of rain.

The charming impression made by this fine picture is intensified by a pallid gleam which touches the ridges of a low-lying meadow, and the soft mystery of the vapours that creep athwart the distant hills. Twilight (305), by the same artist, evinces a modest yet rare sense of beauty in repose. The group of slender ashes on the meadow bank is delicately drawn and graceful; and the warm harmony of evening light in pure and pearly tints is enjoyable. The Hour when Daylight Dies (518) depicts in a singularly fine and sympathetic fashion the effect of fading twilight upon a group of cottages near a wayside stream, which, gleaming as it passes below a footbridge, reflects the ragged elms, the sky and its many bars of cloud, the ashy-purple evening band, and the golden tints of the nearer air. The Meadows by Haddon Hall (640) is a delightful reminder of the sylvan beauty of the Derbyshire Wye. Its lush foliage and herbage are full of colour, and the silvery tenderness of the atmosphere has been subtly used to combine the whole in such a harmony as we have seldom till now obtained from Mr. Waterlow, whose improvement in landscape painting is manifest.

The brilliancy of No. 26, April Afternoon, offers a considerable contrast to the pearliness of No. 640. The firm touches, vivid colours, and fine and broad effect are characteristics of Mr. H. W. B. Davis. On the other hand, we care less for Al fresco (140) than for most of his recent works. It depicts sheep in a sun-flecked meadow, an effect which Mr. Davis has sometimes turned to greater account. The sheep are, no doubt, naturally woolly; but that is no reason why they should be so in the technical sense of the word. Smoking after Rain (244) is much more beautiful, because it depicts with great expansiveness and fine gradations of the air and local colours a shallow valley, part of a wide autumnal landscape, which is counter-checked with masses of light and shade that are subdued into harmony with each other, without in the least losing the brilliancy and force of nature. The First Breath of Autumn (324) supplies some capital specimens of Mr. Davis's horse painting. There is much breadth and light, and the far-reaching rain-cloud is most impressively treated. In short, this is a rare piece of English poetic pastoral painting, such as the artist has often excelled in.—The Brow of the Hill (32), by Mr. H. Harwood, is a richly coloured and well-toned sketch at large of autumnal colours and effect.—Mr. Y. King's landscape, bright, somewhat painty, and rather hard, is called The Miller's Daughter (25), as it includes a mill-stream, dam, and buildings, together with a fairly good female figure. The sky and distance are rather poor and flat. Mr. King's picture, without being a mere conventionality, reminds us of the studio rather than of the open air. His Cottage Garden (360) is fresher and prettier, but it cannot be seen so well.

Mr. MacWhirter, in his energetic and effective piece called Subsiding Flood (48), treats over again what he has often succeeded in depicting, the movements and colours of masses of turbid, peat-stained water, flowing swiftly in a rocky valley, and dashed with the lurid gleams and steel-like reflections of a strong sunset following a period of storms. There is a slight excess of colours that are neither quite pure nor thoroughly harmonized. In fact, this is not Mr. MacWhirter's best picture. To that distinction the brilliant and effective Flowers of the Alps: Anemone and Gentian (196), a treasury of verdure, primrose-like yellow, and splendid blue, has no feeble claims. It reminds us to some extent of a similar landscape by this painter which was here last year. Like that picture, it represents the long and curving vista of an Alpine valley, and the slopes of the stream's banks gorgeously decked with blossoms. The resplendent light contrasts with the pure, clear, yet deep-toned shadows of the opposite hills, and those still darker shadows which follow the pale gleams that race towards the distant snow-clad peaks. Below the slope a little mountain village, such as travellers in Tyrol know so well, nestles near the water and about its ancient square-towered church. Pair Strathpey (289) we owe not to Mr. MacWhirter's present tastes, but to a sort of recrudescence of an older and much less admirable phase of his painting, not approved of by exacting critics. Some of his too-well-remembered birches "adorn" the lofty foreground, and serve to frame the view of a level country which used to be almost constantly present on our artist's canvases. The fact is, we have had more than enough of Strathpey when made "fair" by artificial means like these. Twixt the Gloom and the Mirk (295) justifies Mr. MacWhirter more than any of his pictures of the year except "Flowers of the Alps," which is a masterpiece in its way. The artist is fonder of vistas than most painters; this is one of the best of them, and extends between feathery ashes and birches which lift their autumnal foliage against the sky, and are delicately touched. The keeping of the light, shadows, and bright and pure local colours is excellent, and, indeed, the painting of the nearer branches and the bluish-grey of the distant pine woods is admirable. The atmosphere, too, is well studied and the composition excellent. Still we like the painter better when he is in Italy and Sicily than when his foot is on, or supposed to be on, his native heather. So sympathetic and able an artist is bound to find new materials, motives, and subjects, and to paint them with freshness as well as with force and luminosity.—Between the Wood and the Sea (60), by Mr. H. H. Robinson, is natural, broad, good in colour, and, when thus treated, not hackneyed.—Very much hackneyed, indeed, is Mr. J. W. North's sadly mannered Bolton Abbey (66). Feverish and "tinty," it is but a travesty of materials too often vamped up. The shadowless and pale verdure, and the water which is nondescript, are the thinnest parts of one of the thinnest of pictures we have come across in the exhibition. It makes it clear that Mr. North's too easily won reputation was due to fresh subjects freshly treated, but these are now no longer fresh in any respect, and had better disappear if they are to be treated as in Summer Waters (498). A Mill-Pond in a Blossoming Land (663), the last in order of Mr. North's contributions to the Academy, not only demonstrates the circumscribed nature of his studies, but indicates the limits of his resources and his indifference to his public and his future.

THE SALON.

(Third Notice.)

At the Champ de Mars a picture by M. Welden Hawkins represents in the following fashion Matrisme et Idéalisme (No. 597). An old man with a long beard crouches on the ground at the side of a pond where frogs and tadpoles, eggs ranged on the sand, mushrooms, and a serpent symbolize the transformations and the malignant forces of matter. Beside him on a map of the world is perched a raven, exactly at the spot where are figured the contours of Europe, while in Africa the Sahara and the Congo appear to be lighted up with a reflection of the dawn! Opposite the old man, in a great white light, in the middle of flowering branches of shrubs as straight as candles, appears a naked figure of a young girl, holding in her hand a luminous flower: this is Idealism, and the dazzled old man cannot bear the radiance of it without shading his eyes with an ancient mask by way of a screen. As a commentary on this picture, at once commonplace and complicated—upon which philosophers may discourse at their leisure, but which lovers of good painting will find but mediocre—the painter exhibits No. 599, Nell (a mystic picture, he is careful to state in the catalogue), and an Eve (598) in which he strives his best to imitate the manner of Sir E. Burne-Jones.

This ancient conflict between idealism and materialism ought not to trouble artists. In fact, if there be any place in the world where an accord should exist between the two principles, it ought certainly to be in the mind and the conscience of a painter. The exigencies, and even the conditions, of his art forbid him to be sceptical of the reality of matter and of life. It is in their forms and manifestations that all the resources at his disposal are contained, and, on the other hand, there is no form so humble that his thought, his love, cannot introduce some touch of morality which elevates it and transforms it, an idea and an ideal. Suppose him to have found himself confronted by a piece of nature, and to have depicted it for us according to the prodilections, instinctive or assumed, of his mind, of his heart, and of his race, a something has been mingled with the material which spiritualizes it and concerns it. Under a simple piece of nature-morte a dream may be conveyed and revealed. All art is at bottom symbolic—through this necessary intervention of a human will, of a human sensibility, and of a human love—and similarly every created form can in a certain sense become symbolical. The higher the design and the ideal of the artist, the more need for their expression have they of suggestive forms and extraordinary receptivity; and thus it is that the great painter and the great sculptor take possession of the human body as of a living ideogram.

But it is with allegory as with language in the fables of Æsop: one can employ it for better and for worse. If the thoughts of the artist remain entangled in the symbol, if we feel in them an effort at a laborious translation after the fashion of a schoolboy, if the penetration is not direct and, as it were, spontaneous, nothing is more cold or more vain. In this epoch of neo-idealism, intentionisme, and symbolism, it is impossible to put painters too much on their guard against the danger of these pretentious and useless riddles, which in their endeavour to suggest overmuch end in signifying nothing at all.

Another danger that besets the fashionable idealism is that of inducing the painter to doubt the reality of the external world, and to represent it by a gamut of colours more and more faint, by a system of forms more and more vague, evanescent, and distant—so much so, in fact, that the canvases of a large number of our young men eventually resemble pale and floating apparitions or invocations of shadows, dreamed rather than seen in some spiritualistic séance, or, to speak more accurately, some hallucination of a smoker of opium. The "Paradis artificiels" of Baudelaire would find at the present day their true illustrators. All this is quite unhealthy, and generally most mediocre. An insufferable pedantry is combined with an evident insincerity. Yet it is a malady which will pass away. The masters who in their works have contrived to express the most ideas and suggested the most au delà are also among those who have studied nature most closely, from Albert Dürer to Gustave Moreau and Burne-Jones.

A painter has every right in the world to be no thinker, but if he desires to express an idea, the best support to give to this idea is after all a form which is self-sufficient. M. Rochegrosse, for example, at the Champs Élysées has borrowed from the 'Paraisal' of Wagner the motif of the scene of filles-fleurs (No. 1574) in the magic gardens of Klingensur; the flowers spring to life under the footsteps of Paraisal, become women, and seek to make him forget his mission. But he, his eyes fixed on his ideal aim, steps across their seductive groups, deaf to their appeals. The painter who has invented, in order to represent the temptations, the most ingenious and most winning forms, has faltered at the essential moment. He has been tempted by the picturesque idea of the transformations of the flowers, and with a rare facility has he painted them at the moment of their assuming for an instant the ephemeral appearance of a woman. They rise around the knight, place themselves in his path, call or embrace him. The iris and the poppy, the honeysuckle and the violet, the rose and the cornflower, the tulip and the lily, the carnation and the pansy are certainly filles-fleurs in their metamorphosis; they offer themselves and they entwine, they hang down or they glide with tenderness or ahyness, with carresses or swoons which continue and symbolize, in the gesture or attitude of a woman, the obscure soul and, as it were, moral resemblance of the flower. And these transformations, impossible to express in words, the painting by the undulations and the rhythm of its lines renders clear and charming. Around this graceful group, as far as the close of the horizon, the verdant landscape rises in the light, and an enchanted atmosphere of air and sun pervades the scene. All this is truly painterlike, full of invention, of verve, and of talent. But by an unlucky thought M. Rochegrosse has clad Paraisal in the armour of Lohengrin, and the silver breast-plate plays in the middle of the landscape exactly the rôle of a boule du jardin. It reflects like a mirror all that surrounds it, and in this confusion of reflections the eye goes astray so completely that the knight himself, the hero of the piece, evaporates and disappears. It is really a thousand pities that, having so firm a hold of the heart of the apologist, he is so inconsistent as to appearance and form, for it is of form that the idea had in this instance need.

A great number of painters thus go and ask of the poets or the musicians the motives of their pictures, and I do not see that there is any ground for protesting in the name of the distinction of genre. The co-operation of poetry and the plastic arts is almost as old as art itself. We find scenes from the Iliad or the Odyssey on the most ancient Greek vases. It was a line of Homer that made Phidias see the majesty of Zeus, and the Greek sculptors did nothing else than realize in marble the radiant visions of the poets who had anticipated them. At the outset of the Quattrocento, Leo Battista Alberti in his work on painting recommended the studious painter to cultivate the friendship and to live in the intimacy of "the poets, rhetoricians, and other men of letters," who would furnish him with some of those beautiful inventions from which painting derives such glory; and one knows all that the 'Stanze' of Messer Angelo Poliziano inspired or suggested to Sandro Botticelli. But Leo Battista Alberti took good care to say that the painter ought not to ignore "the true method of instructing himself." "Before everything, it is of nature that he ought to demand the degrees of knowledge." It is necessary that round the idea or the image engendered by his reading natural and living forms come to arrange themselves, spontaneous and persuasive, docile and animated! Burne-Jones and Gustave Moreau send nothing to the Salons this year. They are the undisputed masters of poetical painting. In their absence the visitor to the Champs Élysées must content himself with the Valkyries of M. G. Bussière (330), the Narrisse of M. G. Desvallières (606), the Comte de Fles of M. Jean Veber (1800), the Douleur of M. Henri Martin (1265), the Troyens of Carthage of M. Fantin-Latour (714), Le Sphinx et les Dieux of M. Raoul du Gardier (660), the Enfant et la Vérité of M. G. William Joy (1005), and the Judas of M. Forau (744)—at the Champ de Mars, the Benitrix of M. Aman-Jean (24); Les Filices, by M. John Humphreys Johnston (648); Melancholia, by M. Louis Picard (898); and Harmonie virginale, by M. Osbert (872), &c.

M. Ary Renan, painter and poet, loves to introduce dreamlike figures into melancholy landscapes, and has embodied at the Champ de Mars a poetical idea in a plastic form.

Ab! qui m'emportera sur des flots sans rivage?

Lamartine exclaimed, and M. Renan beholds pass before his eyes Le Poète et le Mirage (947), a fine and plaintive harmony of yellow bank, light sky, and pale sea—a subtle and distant impression, a remembrance of musings by some Broton shore, and, in this mirage of nature truly Lamartinean and slightly inconsistent, a deceitful galley gliding in a mist over slumbering waves, while from the bank the poet casts to it a grand gesture of appeal, regret, and farewell.

In a beautiful sonnet which he printed lately in the Revue de Paris M. Ary Renan gave a species of commentary on his picture:—

Ce soir, dans le couchant, sur les flots déjà gris,
J'ai vu partir au large, ainsi qu'un vol d'alouettes,
Des goélettes d'or, des galères vermeilles,
Et des navires blancs de tous les galants.

L'escadre appareillait, penchant ses mâts fleuris
D'un pavots de victoire aux couleurs non pareilles,
Et vers les ports lointains du pays des merveilles
Cinglait, la barre au vent et sans prendre de ris.

Mais elle a disparu comme un lointain mirage:
Un grain d'écume d'écume a caché le naufrage
Dans les plus irrités de ses tourbillons noirs;
Tandis que je pleurais, sur le sable des grèves,
Les débris royaux et les vagues espères
Qui porte dans ses flancs la fôte de mes rêves:

Scylla (948) depicts, in the middle of a furious sea, under the sad reflections of a moon that is itself hidden from view, on a desolate, solitary, yet serene night, the apparition, from the bottom of a blue abyss of raging waves, of a sharp rock to which, bleeding from sharp edges of coral, the siren has attached herself, and, as if incursed on the rock, she lifts to the silent sky her head and eyes, more sorrowful than cruel, impatient, it may be supposed, of an impossible deliverance and of liberation from her work of death.

Finally, in a triptych which has not been painted for the boudoir of lovely woman, a Flemish painter, M. Léon Frédéric, introduces us to a really terrible vision of the end of the world. Tout est Mort! (470) he says. Justice is dead and also Religion; their murdered bodies lie in the foreground. What advantage in preserving a world henceforth useless? God has veiled His face and let loose His destroying angels. From the height of heaven they hurl upon earth enormous blocks of rock which, as they roll in the dense ranks of mortals, dig valleys of carnage, rivers of blood. There is nothing to be seen but torn, wan corpses, crushed, heaped together: women and children, old men and young. And rising from all parts great tongues of flames lick, envelope, and are on the point of devouring these mountains of dead. The vision is of terrific precision. One feels that it has haunted and possessed the painter, and he has spent in painting it a truly admirable store of conviction and will, and even of talent. A more adroit man would have, perhaps, made of it a masterpiece. M. Frédéric has bestowed on it a fund of invention that would have sufficed for several masterpieces, yet the masterpiece he has not achieved. ANDRÉ MICHEL.

THE HERALDIC EXHIBITION.

In the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries at Burlington House there has been brought together a most interesting exhibition of the various applications of heraldry. Among the principal contributors are Her Majesty the Queen, the Earl of Verulam, the Earl of Crawford, Lord Sackville, Sir Wollaston Franks (President), the Herald's College, and the Deans and Chapters of Canterbury and Westminster.

The first exhibition of the kind under the Society's auspices was held in 1862; but the present one, although confined to English heraldry, surpasses it in every way.

In the entrance hall and on the staircase are some good examples of cast-iron firebacks decorated with arms, while a collection of armorial china, &c., occupies the wall cases.

Among the objects in the meeting-room we notice foremost the helm and crest, the shield, surcoat, and gauntlets that have for five centuries hung above the Black Prince's tomb at Canterbury. These interesting historical relics are in a sadly dilapidated state after so long a lapse of years, and the chief reason for their being permitted to leave, for the first time, the precincts of the cathedral is that the opinion of experts may be taken as to their future preservation. Among other important objects are the shield of Henry V. from his chapel at Westminster; the gorgeous illuminated Westminster Tournament Roll of 1510, lent by the Herald's College; a fine series of coloured photographs of stall plates of the Knights of the Garter, exhibited by Mr. St. John Hope; and a large number of curious and historical book-plates contributed by the President. Above these hangs a fine English carpet with the royal and other arms, dated 1570, belonging to Lo d Verulam. The other walls are hung with illuminated pedigrees and rubbings of bronzes. In table cases are a number of richly illuminated books contributed by Her Majesty the Queen, the Heralds' College, and Lord Crawford, and a choice selection of heraldic seals.

In the Library, one side is entirely taken up by a huge screen, on which is hung a fine chronological series of nearly fifty grants of arms. The earliest of these are the letters patent of Henry VI. granting arms to his colleges of Eton and King's in 1448-9; the latest is an exemplification granted to Lord Byron, the poet, in 1822. At the lower end of the room, on stands, are the embroidered tabards of Sir William Dugdale and other officers of arms; and on a table near is the veritable crown made for Charles II. at the Restoration, which Col. Blood tried to carry off from the Tower. The jewels it contained have been transferred to the present crown. At the upper end of the room hangs a splendid cloth of gold pall with the arms and badges of Henry VII., lent by the University of Oxford. On the other walls are displayed rolls of arms, illuminated pedigrees and patents of nobility, &c. The table cases contain an interesting selection of books, badges, chains and jewels, and other objects. The exhibition will remain open till Wednesday, the 13th inst., and can be seen either by tickets (to be obtained from the Secretary of the Society) or on presentation of visiting card. Should a sufficient number of subscribers be received, an illustrated catalogue, limited to 250 copies, will be issued at a price not exceeding a guinea and a half.

RECENT ARCHAEOLOGICAL WORK IN CYPRUS.

MR. MYRES sends us the following notes:—

"The excavations on behalf of the British Museum, which were carried on at Amathus (Palaio Limneso) during the winter, came to an end in March, and the bulk of the antiquities will reach England shortly. Some of the objects found are of considerable interest, but comment must of course be reserved until the publication of the official report. The share which fell to the Cyprus Government will shortly be exhibited in the museum at Nicosia.

"The balance of the Cyprus Exploration Fund was lately handed over to the British School of Archaeology at Athens, and it has been found possible to carry out a few small excavations with this help. The first trial was made in the well-known necropolis of Agia Paraskevi, near Nicosia, with the view of verifying recent statements as to the succession of styles in the primitive pottery there. The necropolis has been already so thoroughly ransacked that very little of intrinsic importance was found, but it became evident that no hard-and-fast line can be drawn between classes of tombs, as the most primitive forms and workmanship are frequently associated with the most advanced. Nor is it by any means clear that the style of the painted vases is always influenced by Mycenaean importations, or by the so-called 'Phœnician bowls.'

"A similar, but smaller and poorer necropolis has been discovered and explored near Kalopala, about twelve miles west of Famagusta. The pottery is of coarser workmanship throughout than at Agia Paraskevi, but presents some features peculiar to itself. Imported pottery seems to be rare. Bronze weapons of several types are found—a few of unusual size. Iron is as usual unrepresented, and silver ornaments are very rare. Traces seem to exist of a settlement and pot-kiln associated with this necropolis.

"A few trenches have been opened on a promontory in the Salt Lake near Larnaca, which had attracted the attention, formerly, of Colonna Ceccaldi and of Sir Charles Newton. The site, however, proved barren. On the other hand, a mound, also close to the Salt Lake, which seems to have been trenched by General di Cesnola on the advice of Ceccaldi, but of which no adequate account exists, has yielded several more short Phœnician inscriptions—two of them graffiti on black-glazed pottery—and the ground plan of a building of uncertain date and purpose.

"Digging still goes on here in the necropolis of Kitron, on the site where the Phœnician inscription, now in the British Museum, was found some twelve years ago. A similar inscribed stèle has been found already, built into a Roman tomb.

"Dr. Max Ohnefalsch Richter, whose contributions to Cypriot archaeology are well known, has lately returned to Cyprus to conduct excavations at Dali (Idalion) on behalf of the Berlin Museum. Little of importance had been found before digging was stopped by the harvest. Prof. Furtwängler is expected immediately, and work will shortly be resumed.

"The magnificent Gothic church of St. Nicholas at Famagusta, which has served as a mosque since the Turkish conquest, has been long in need of repair; and it is matter for congratulation that the authorities of Evkaf (Mosque Estates Commission) are doing what is needful to prevent further damage. The nave vaulting and clearstory walls have been examined and repaired; and the great west window, and the other windows of the nave in which original tracery is preserved, have been cleared of lattice and plaster, carefully strengthened, and filled with cathedral glass. No 'restoration' has been attempted in the windows which have lost their tracery. It is much to be hoped that when the pavement is attended to it will be possible to protect the many valuable inscriptions from the wear and tear to which they are exposed, especially near the doors.

"In this connexion, the appearance of Major Tankerville Chamberlayne's collection of the mediæval inscriptions in Cyprus will make accessible a great amount of hitherto unpublished material, both in text and in commentary. The book is entitled 'Lacrimæ Nicosienses'; it is written in French, published in Paris (Quatin), and handsomely printed and illustrated. A second volume is in preparation.

"Mr. C. D. Cobham has just finished a third edition of his invaluable 'Attempt at a Bibliography of Cyprus' (Nicosia, Government Printing Office, 1894). The number of titles has risen, from 309 in the edition of 1889, to 437; and new lists of maps of Cyprus and of Consular Reports have been added."

Wheatley, engraved by Schiavonetti, Cardon, and Vendramini, 93*l.* Going to Labour, Preparing for Market, after F. Wheatley, by R. Earlom, 29*l.*

Just-3rt Gessly.

THE good pictures in the Japanese Gallery are few, but among them some are noteworthy, such as J. Van Kessel's 'Landscape near Haarlem' (No. 9), Hobbema's 'Landscape with a Water-Mill and Trees' (15), Metau's sketch of 'A Woman Seated' (16), P. Moreelse's 'Portrait of a Lady' (19), and Marcellis the serpent painter's 'Serpent, Bird, and Mouse' (21).

THE exhibition of bronzes at Messrs. Bellman, Ivey & Carter's, to which we alluded last week, is worthy of a visit, on account of its containing reduced copies from many modern masterpieces of sculpture, mostly French, such as the 'Belluaire' of M. Mariotton, M. Delcour's 'Phœbe,' M. Vibert's 'La Pêche,' M. Mercier's 'Almées,' the 'Amour aux Colombes' of M. Injalbert, 'La Chanson' of M. Charpentier, M. Fremiet's superb equestrian 'romance' of 'St. George,' and the vigorous 'Au But!' of M. Boucher, being the three naked runners towards a goal.

THE seventeenth annual meeting of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings is to be held in the Old Hall, Clifford's Inn, next Thursday evening. Mr. J. T. Micklethwaite will occupy the chair, and Mr. Heywood Sumner will read a paper on 'Protection and Production.'

At a meeting held last week the Council of the Glasgow Archaeological Society passed a resolution deprecating the removal of the Tron Steeple, which, erected about 1637, has been for over 250 years one of the best-known and most picturesque landmarks of the city.

MR. WROTH has reprinted from the Numismatic Chronicle an account of the Greek coins acquired by the British Museum in 1893. They number 4 of gold and electrum, 118 silver, and 281 bronze coins. Among them are rare tetradrachms of Philip II. and Alexander; a unique coin of Hecyzelmis, King of the Odrysæ, a monarch unknown to the modern world till Lolling published in 1889 an inscription found in the Acropolis, and mentioning him; a remarkable coin of Messalina's, purchased from a London dealer; an Æginetic drachm of the Opuntian Locrians; a didrachm of Elis; a fine didrachm of Pheneus in Arcadia; one of Cydonia in Crete; a fine Lampenean stater; a gold stater issued at Ephesus in the early part of the first Mithradatic war; and a Pergamene coin of the Emperor Decius.

OWING to an accident, which was not of our causing, we have hitherto omitted to record the death, on the 14th ult., of Mr. Edmund Gill—

"Waterfall Gill"—which happened after a short illness, at Hackbridge, Carshalton. He was buried in the churchyard of the latter place. Born in Clerkenwell on November 29th, 1820, the son of a joiner, he, owing to his marked liking for art, became a portrait-painter, in which capacity he at first established himself with limited success at Ludlow. He does not seem to have received any regular training at the Academy or elsewhere, but industry helped his natural sympathies, and he soon obtained considerable skill in the branches of art he had selected. At Hereford he found so much favour that a local subscription enabled him to turn his attention to landscape painting in Wales and afterwards to go to London. At the British Institution in 1842 he for the first time appeared publicly with 'View in Croft Park'; in 1846 he sent to the Academy 'A Storm Scene,' and he was otherwise represented at Suffolk Street. From 1842 he was a very frequent contributor to these galleries, sending more than a hundred and fifty works. His taste led him to paint cascades and breaking seas, especially as viewed from lofty cliffs. On these occasions he more than justified the respect and attention with which his works were received by this journal, the London Review, and other papers. We are sorry to learn that the later portion of this capable and modest artist's life was not blessed with a competence, and that his widow is "totally unprovided for."

THE Accademia dei Lincei purposed some time ago to bring out a reproduction of the Codice Atlantico of Leonardo with the help of the Italian Government. M. Hoepli, of Milan, it seems, is to be the publisher.

Two excellent articles on the proposal to submerge Philæ and devastate Nubia, by Prof. Mahaffy and Mr. Dillon, appear in this month's Nineteenth Century. The cause of the Vandals was pleaded with a certain amount of timidity by Mr. Lockyer in last week's Nature.

In the province of Angora (Ancyra) M. Chantre, of the Lyons Museum, is continuing the explorations announced in the Athenæum, and he will afterwards engage in excavations on account of the Imperial Museum at Constantinople. There is a report from Mossul of the discovery of cuneiform inscriptions and a colossal female statue. Father Scheil, who is superintending excavations at Bagdad, has been sent by the Imperial Museum to Mossul to examine the statue. The Museum authorities, who used formerly to devote themselves chiefly to Greek antiquities, have now attached Father Scheil to their staff for cuneiform.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—'Les Huguenots,' 'Faust,' 'Lucia di Lammermoor.'
ALBERT HALL.—Madame Patti in 'Gabriella.'
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Richter Concerts.

WHAT may be termed polyglot performances of opera are not uncommon abroad, but until recently they were unknown in London. Now, however, at Covent Garden there is considerable confusion of tongues, owing to the different nationalities of the artists engaged by Sir Augustus Harris. Thus, on Thursday last week in 'Les Huguenots,' the chorus sang in Italian while the principals adhered to the original French text. The latter is certainly preferable in such an essentially French work as Meyerbeer's masterpiece. The new Valentine, Madame Adini, who has sung with success for several years in Paris, is not very likely to become a favourite on this side of the Channel. She is handsome and even imposing in appearance, and she acts with intelligence, but her powerful voice is hard and unsympathetic in quality. M. Cossira was capable as Raoul; but by far the most enjoyable impersonations were those of Mlle. Simonnet as Marguerite de Valois, M. Plançon as Marcel, and M. Albers as De Nevers. These were all admirable embodiments.

Marguerite in 'Faust' has not hitherto been numbered among Madame Melba's most striking assumptions, yet she was remarkably successful in Gounod's masterpiece last Saturday, her voice, which has greatly improved in quality as well as volume since she first appeared at Covent Garden six years ago, being nearly as effective as that of Christine Nilsson in her prime. The Walpurgis ballet scene was given on this occasion, but was received with some marks of disfavour, probably on account of the lateness of the hour at which it was presented. No other reason can be assigned for the sibilant sounds which mingled with the applause.

Only a few words of record are required concerning the revival of Donizetti's faded 'Lucia di Lammermoor' on Tuesday. The opera was given, it is understood, by desire of Madame Melba, and the Australian prima donna certainly evinced the marvellous improvement she has made as a vocalist since she first appeared at Covent Garden as the demented heroine in 1888. She was efficiently supported on this occasion by Signor Boduschi and M. Dufriche.

'Gabriella,' a one-act opera composed by Signor Emilio Pizzi expressly for Madame Patti, and played with her co-operation in the United States during her recent tour, was presented in concert-room form at the Albert Hall last Saturday afternoon, with moderate success. The libretto by MM. Alfred Byrne and Fulvio Fulgonio is trivial, though perfectly void of offence, and the music is a mixture of old-fashioned Italian opera and the new style as developed by Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Puccini, and other musicians. 'Gabriella' would have little chance of success on the London operatic stage; dramatic strength and consistency being now regarded as essential, united to virile and emotional music. The operetta was well rendered, Madame Patti receiving commendable assistance from Miss Lily Moody, Mr. Robert Kaufmann, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Mr. Franklin Clive, the composer conducting. There was a somewhat tiresome first part, concerning which details are not required.

The summer series of Richter Concerts this year is unhappily limited to four, in consequence of the Viennese conductor's engagements in his own city and at Bayreuth. At the first performance, on Monday evening, Herr Richter's pre-eminence as the director of an orchestra was displayed in Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony and Wagner's Preludes to 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal.' Brahms's fine Variations on a Theme in B flat by Haydn were also splendidly interpreted. In the centre of the programme there was an interesting novelty, namely, Smetana's 'Vyschrad,' a symphonic poem, No. 1 of a series denominated 'Mein Vaterland.' It is intended to suggest the rise and fall of the famous Bohemian fortress; but to those unacquainted with the building it must, of course, appeal simply as abstract music, and as such it may certainly pass muster, for although the formal outline is indefinite, the themes are captivating and the orchestration full of picturesque effects. In brief, 'Vyschrad' is not a formal symphony, but a symphonic poem, and the terms can never be synonymous.

Musical Society.

In the forthcoming number of the Century, M. Antonin Dvorák will contribute an article on Franz Schubert, in the preparation of which he has been assisted by Mr. Henry T. Finck.

PIANOFORTE recitals continue in unabated numbers, the first to be noted at present being that of Miss Marie Gieselschap at the Steinway Hall on Thursday evening last week. Owing, perhaps, to nervousness, the young executant commenced rather unsatisfactorily, but in various items by Schumann and Chopin, including the former composer's 'Papillons,' and in other items by Brahms, Dvorák, and Paradies, Miss Gieselschap displayed a decidedly musical touch and much intelligence in respect of phrasing, &c.

Those agreeable young duettists Miss Schidrowitz and Miss Zagury gave their second afternoon concert, also at the Steinway Hall, on Friday last week. They both sang very pleasantly in songs and duets by Pergolesi, Paisello, Meyerbeer, Schumann, Gounod, Tchaikowsky, Saint-Saëns, and Sullivan. These names are a sufficient guarantee for the excellence of the programme, in which the concert-givers received able assistance from Mr. W. H. Squire, Mr. Oudin, M. Achille Rivarde, and Miss Kate Rorke, the gifted actress last named giving a recitation.

Mlle. CHAMINADE's third annual concert at St. James's Hall last Saturday afternoon consisted entirely of the French artist's vocal and instrumental compositions. To mention individual items when all were more or less pleasant to hear would be manifestly unfair, and it need only be said that in the interpretation of a number of songs, vocal duets, and instrumental pieces Mlle. Chaminade received unexceptionable aid from Miss Liza Lehmann, Mlle. Landi, and Mr. Arthur Oswald.

THE success of M. Slivinski's pianoforte recital on the same afternoon at the Queen's Hall was somewhat affected by the serious and unexplained delay in the time of commencement, and this may to some extent account for the chilly reception accorded to the clever Polish pianist's rendering of pieces by Mozart, Handel, Chopin, Schubert, Schumann, and other composers; but on the whole, M. Slivinski's playing was more marked by excellence of technique than inspiration.

THE next recital was that of M. Raoul Pugno at the Princes' Hall on Monday afternoon, when this very capable performer played a very promising Sonata in D minor from his own pen, and was joined by M. Hollman in M. Saint-Saëns's Sonata in C minor for pianoforte and violoncello, Op. 32. M. Pugno also created legitimate effects in no ordinary measure in excerpts from Bach, Handel, Schumann, and Chopin. He will be heard again with pleasure at a less busy period.

A successful chamber concert was given by the Royal Academy of Music at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. Messrs. G. Walenn, W. H. Reed, A. Walenn, and B. P. Parker formed an excellent ensemble in Grieg's Quartet in C minor, Mr. M. Donnanwell displayed much skill as a flautist in a Suite by Godard, Op. 116, and Miss Gertrude Peppercorn as a pianist in Raff's 'Giga con Variazioni' from the Suite in D minor. These were among the most promising performances of the afternoon.

THE entertainment given by Miss Janotha at Daly's Theatre on Tuesday afternoon was a mixture of music and the drama. Mention may be made of two tasteful little songs, more in the style of alight German Lieder than ordinary English ballads, by Princess Eleatrice, the words being from the pen of the late Lord Beaconsfield. The singer was Madame Amy Sherwin, who also introduced, with the aid of a small section of the Guildhall School Choir, under Sir Joseph Barnby, a graceful setting of the 'Ave Maria' by Miss Janotha. The rest of the programme does not call for remark.

On the same afternoon a concert was given at the Queen's Hall by sixty-six members of the Swedish Young Men's Christian Association. It consisted for the most part of unaccompanied part-music by Kjerulf, Wennerberg, Prince Gustav, Reissiger, Lindblad, and other composers but little known in this country. The singing was marked by powerful tone and perfection in ensemble.

MR. JOSEF LUDWIG, who has long been recognized as an excellent violinist and teacher, gave an orchestral concert at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening, and appeared with unexpected success as a composer. A manuscript Symphony in F from his pen proved to be a decidedly clever work, in which the influence of Beethoven, in what the Bonn master once described as his "unbuttoned" mood, was distinctly apparent. Messrs. Josef and Paul Ludwig gave a highly commendable performance of Brahms's Double Concerto in a minor for violin and violoncello, and agreeable vocal assistance was rendered by Mrs. Hutchinson.

THE programme of the general rehearsal for the Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, which will take place on Friday, the 22nd inst., at noon, has now been arranged. It will include the "Hallelujah" and "Amen" choruses from 'The Messiah,' a considerable number of items from 'Israel in Egypt,' and many from the scheme of the Selection Day, of course comprising the principal novelties at these gigantic gatherings, which are the chorus "Let our glad songs," from 'Deborah,' the imposing chorus "How dark, O Lord, are Thy decrees," from 'Jephtha,' and the Concerto in D for strings, oboes, bassoons, and organ.

THE Royal National Eisteddfod at Carnarvon will be opened on July 10th, the performances occupying four days. The Prince and Princess of Wales are expected to be present. Programmes of the proceedings will be issued about the 23rd of this month.

SIGNOR SONZOGNO, who has constituted himself the Mæcenæ of modern Italian music, is having the following operas written for him, many of which will be produced this autumn: P. Mascagni, 'Silvano,' libretto by G. Targioni Tozzetti; R. Leoncavallo, 'Orlando di Berlino,' libretto by S. Taubert; S. Samara, 'Madonnenetta,' libretto by L. Illica; G. Cipollini, 'Ninon de Lenclos,' libretto by A. Cipollini; U. Giordano, 'Andrea Chenier,' libretto by L. Illica; F. Cilea, 'L'Arlesiana,' libretto by Marengo; G. B. Coronaro, 'Claudia,' libretto by G. D. Bartocci-Fontana; V. von Westerhout, 'Fortunio,' libretto by R. Scallinger.

DURING the past season at the Brussels Théâtre de la Monnaie the most successful of the novelties were Bruneau's 'L'Attaque du Moulin' and Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde,' the number of performances of both these works having been only exceeded by those of Gounod's 'Faust.'

WE have received the vocal scores of M. Massenet's 'Werther' (Paris, Hengel et Cie.) and Mr. F. H. Cowen's 'Signa' (Ascherberg & Co.). These works are both full of interest, and shall receive due attention when produced at Covent Garden.

DRAMA

RECENT BIOGRAPHY.

Recollections of Fred Leslie. By W. T. Vincent. 2 vols. (Kegan Paul & Co.)—A life of Fred Hobson, otherwise Leslie, is superfluous, though scarcely unacceptable. The actor's early death prevented him from taking the rank to which he became entitled, and his abilities, which were conspicuous, were wasted on burlesque, surely of all forms of art the least considerable or significant. In burlesque, however, Leslie in modern days had no equal. Among the complimentary tributes which his biographer collects is one from the Athenæum to the effect that, "As Robinson gave burlesque some of the vigour and intensity of tragedy, Leslie may be said almost to have elevated it into comedy." From this opinion there is no call to recede. Burlesque though it was in part, Leslie's presentation of Rip van Winkle was scarcely, if at all, inferior to that on the strength of which Joseph Jefferson built his high reputation. In late years Leslie, under the punning pseudonym of "A. C. Torr," took part in the fabrication of the parodies in which he appeared. His share in these did not, probably, extend far beyond introducing for himself and Miss Farren "business" and situations likely to prove effective, or into his own parts the jokes, devices, and fancies for which the professional and passably mysterious name is "wheezes." This much, however, must be conceded. With the aid of his brilliant associate Miss Farren, Leslie brought back into favour a class of entertainment that had fallen into contempt. He did more, indeed. More than any other he contributed to raise burlesque from the position it occupied as a bâtard de rideau to that of a complete evening's entertainment. That his signal grace and delicacy and his very genuine comic powers failed to make the thing itself other than contemptible is no individual grievance. To a very large world the Gaiety burlesques, supported by Leslie and Miss Farren, were the most exhilarating of entertainments, and those which competed most successfully, because on most even terms, with the music-halls. That Leslie's gifts fitted him for the performance of comedy was generally granted. He played, indeed, in excellent style some parts in comedy, and always contemplated quitting burlesque. Financial reasons are, however, among the strongest, and Leslie died in his mill-horse round. As a life Mr. Vincent's memoir is all that is necessary or easily conceivable. Enjoying a close intimacy with Leslie, Mr. Vincent received most of his confidences and maintained with him a vigorous correspondence. The effect of the perusal of the volumes is somewhat saddening. One is sorry for the premature death of a capable and delightful actor, and sorrier to find a series of complaints that he has not received recognition to which he was not entitled. Querulous Leslie's letters scarcely are. They show, however, that curious absence of all sense of proportion which practice of the histrionic art nearly always begets. Fortune, or what is practically such, came to Leslie early, and fame was following in its wake. An equal amount of capacity and exertion has seldom produced a more encouraging result. Like most followers of a profession the most morally debilitating of all, Leslie seems to have been confident of his ability to scale Olympus at a bound, and discontented because recognition of the fact was not instantly accorded. Mr. Vincent's volumes are profusely illustrated. Portraits of Leslie at various ages form an interesting feature. In some cases, however, the choice of subjects is curiously like that of the fabricator of extra-illustrated books. Mr. Irving's name is mentioned, and a portrait of Mr. Irving is introduced. Leslie performs in Edinburgh, and we have pictures of Holyrood and Salisbury Crags from the Canongate. Many of the pictures are none the less now and interesting. Mr. Vincent's book will serve to keep alive the memories of an amiable man and a fascinating actor. It is ushered in by a sympathetic introduction by Mr. Clement Scott.

Leaves from the Autobiography of Tommaso Salvini. (Fisher Unwin.)—Like that of Mr. Joseph Jefferson, the autobiography of Signor Salvini first saw the light in the Century Magazine. It now appears in volume form with eight portraits, and supplies a fairly animated account of the Italian stage and its principal luminaries during the latter half of the nineteenth century. That any strong light is thrown upon the great actor whose career is now brought under notice may not be said. Signor Salvini speaks appreciatively of the professors from whom he learned his art, and, in the main, of the great artists with whom he has been associated. At the outset we learn how "Modena engaged in my place a young man from Leghorn, of excellent physical and mental qualities and good artistic promise," who turns out to be Ernesto Rossi. At another time he owns that when a youth his admiration for Signora Ristori as an artist was to some extent suffused by a species of softer sentiment. As was natural in the case of an Italian, Salvini enlisted as a soldier, and was the victim of political persecution. Sufficiently stimulating is the account of his experience, and the record of his artistic progress is also full. We fail, however, to get far within the surroundings, and the life, though it teaches us something of the artist, shows us little concerning the man.

Dramatic Society.

MR. PIGOTT, the licensor of plays, has addressed a circular to the managers of music-halls reminding them that the sketches they present are, in fact, stage plays, and therefore must be licensed. The statement that this circular has occasioned consternation in music-hall circles is absurd. Managers have been expecting it since the report of the Select Committee of the last Parliament on the London County Council's Bill, and they are quite prepared to comply with its terms. The sketches performed on the music-hall stage usually belong to migratory companies, and these companies will have to face the fact that plays are, in the first instance, licensed to be performed at a particular theatre. But copyright performances may be held in any public hall, and, so far as we can see, the only effects of the circular will be an addition to the licensor's income.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON'S NEW BOOKS.

TWENTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

A YELLOW ASTER.

By "IOTA."

THIRTEENTH and CHEAP EDITION.

In crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 6s.

This novel has attracted unusual attention. More than 50 columns have been devoted by the press to reviews of the work.

A FEW OPINIONS.

ATHENÆUM.

"The warmest of welcomes is due from the reading public to any new author who conspicuously unites the qualities of intuition, candour respect for the human and the divine, and such a natural straightforwardness as, taken together with the other three qualities, cannot fail to touch and move the heart. A welcome of this kind is unquestionably due to 'Iota.' Few who read these three volumes will deny to 'Iota' an ample, if need be a generous, recognition of the manner in which she has achieved her purpose. The characters are drawn with a notable combination of delicacy and downrightness, and with a pathos which is as effective as it is refined."

SPECTATOR.

"A remarkable performance. It is, we think, a good time since we have had in English fiction anything so strong and impressive as the latter half of 'A Yellow Aster'; nor do we believe that there will be found one person competent to judge who does not see in it art of rare and remarkable excellence."

GUARDIAN.

"Attains to a very high level indeed of pathos and power. The authoress has humour, vivacity, power of vivid description, and force."

SPEAKER.

"We do not pretend to be able to do justice to 'A Yellow Aster' in the space at our command. It is no ordinary novel, either in conception or in treatment, and we feel no surprise at the gossip which has attributed it to at least one woman of well-recognised genius. Altogether a notable book."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"A Saul has arisen among the fictional prophets. 'A Yellow Aster' is distinctly a work of genius remarkable for novelty of plot, force of diction, grace of literary style, and subtlety of psychological analysis. In short, 'A Yellow Aster' is one of those rare novels of superb quality which compel the iciest criticism to thaw and resolve itself into warm admiration and unqualified praise."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"A first impression is that 'A Yellow Aster' is one of the very best novels we have read for many months; a second, that, in saying this, we do it rather less than justice. For it is a novel apart, with a strikingly original subject, which is worked out with a skill which is altogether unusual. This is a strong and excellent story, which, with all its pathos and tragedy, has the refreshment of a tonic."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The main idea is a fine one, and is finely treated; half a dozen chapters of real power follow one another with a noble swing and a sustained force that never degenerates into mere excitement. The book is a clever and interesting one; it is about something, and about something which is new, because people have only just begun to think and talk about it. It will not only be read, it will be useful as well as entertaining to those who read it."

THE WEEKLY SUN.

"Unmistakably the book of the hour. The dialogue is sparkling, and is irradiated ever and anon by bright flashes of humour; and it abounds in fine passages. 'A Yellow Aster' must leap into wide and ever wider popularity."

WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

"A book which is so powerful, that whether you like it or not, an obligation is upon you to return to it and look again."

The Times says:—"A valuable and important contribution to the history of the Napoleonic period. This extremely interesting work."

MEMOIRS to serve for the HISTORY of NAPOLEON I. From 1802 to 1815. By his Private Secretary, Baron CLAUDE FRANÇOIS DE MÉNEVAL. The work completed by the addition of hitherto Unpublished Documents. Translated by ROBERT H. SHERARD. In 3 vols. demy 8vo. cloth gilt and gilt top (about 1400 pages), with Autograph Letters and Photogravure Portraits, 18s. per volume.

The English Edition has been fully Annotated by Mr. SHERARD.

Vols. I. and II. now ready. Vol. III. immediately.

THE GREEN BAY TREE.

The CURIOSITIES of CRITICISM:—The Daily Chronicle says it is "as ordinary a novel as ever helped to fill a book-box"; To-day considers it "worth a score of ordinary novels"; the Lady's Pictorial says it "will attract hundreds by reason of its audacity."

The Sun attributes to it "the snobbish flashiness of the counter-jumper"; the National Observer detects "verve and go," "vigour and cleverness," "the vivacity and sparkle of Disraeli"; the Gentlewoman says "the mantle of Disraeli seems to have fallen on" the authors.

The Pall Mall Gazette says it is "dull, oh so very dull"; Punch finds that "it is all smartly done, no flagging on any page"; the Aberdeen Free Press admires its "cool audacity and pungency of writing"; the Morning Post says "as the story progresses the interest deepens," and describes "a great deal of smart writing" and "a genuine sense of humour."

The North British Mail calls it "a very morass of dreariness"; the St. James's Gazette pronounces it "lively reading," "brightly written"; the Literary World says it is "remarkably clever"; the Liverpool Mercury detects "unquestionable ability."

The World deems it "commonplace in essence, although relieved by a good deal of smartness in the treatment"; the Queen considers that "it is calculated to produce a sensation"; the Manchester Courier says "we can cordially commend this book as an able and welcome addition of the higher class to our lighter literature"; the Bristol Times is of opinion that "the people who liked 'A Yellow Aster' will assuredly go into rapture over 'The Green Bay Tree.'"

*. A Second Edition, in 3 vols., is in the press, the large First Edition having been exhausted.

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

The TEMPLE of DEATH: a Story of Indian Adventure. By EDMUND MITCHELL. In crown 8vo. cloth gilt, with Frontispiece by G. H. Edwards, 6s.

St. James's Gazette.—"The unfolding of the plot never flags, and the action is continually intensified until the final climax is reached. The incidents are thrilling, and the local colouring admirably interwoven with the narrative. Few people who are well launched into the book will want to leave it unfinished."

Athenæum.—"The narrative might well be founded on fact. The details are realistically worked out and the local colouring is exact. In short, this is an attractive bit of sensational fiction."

Leeds Mercury.—"In point of style, in capacity for picturesque and vivid description, in powerful imagination, in skilful construction and development of plot, Mr. Mitchell shows himself a story-teller not unworthy to take rank with veteran favourites."

BY F. HAROLD WILLIAMS.

CONFESSIONS of a POET. In cr. 8vo. cloth gilt, with Portrait, 5s.

"There is much that is graceful and pleasing in 'The Confessions of a Poet.' 'The Poet's Nathanael' is an excellent piece of verse. His work ought to please that large section of the public who appreciate intelligible ideas set forth in harmonious lines."—Daily Telegraph.

THE ART OF ILLUSTRATION: a Popular Treatise on Drawing for the Press, Description of the Processes, &c. By HENRY BLACKBURN, Editor of 'Academy Notes.'

Mr. Blackburn's purpose in this book is to show how drawing for the press may be best adapted to its purpose. All are beautifully illustrated by choice reproductions from some of the best black and white work of the time. The volume is, therefore, a picture-book for the many, as well as a critical treatise for the select few. —Daily News.

3 vols. demy 8vo. 3s.

HISTORY OF CABINETS, from the Union with Scotland to the Acquisition of Canada and Denmark. By W. M. TORRENCE.

It is full of Mr. Torrence's literary characteristics—wide knowledge of history, diligent research, and independent handling of its results, keen political insight, originality of judgment and presentation, and a very individual form of style. The work is undoubtedly of great interest, both historical and constitutional, and should read largely to Mr. Torrence's literary reputation. —Times.

VANISHING LONDON:

A Series of Drawings illustrating some of the Old Houses in London and Westminster lately destroyed or threatened with Demolition.

WITH DESCRIPTIVE NOTES AND INDEX.

By ROLAND W. PAUL.

Examples are given from Westminster, the Strand, Fleet Street, the Temple, Lincoln's Inn, Holborn, and the City, illustrating over Sixty Old Houses, Doorways, Fireplaces, Ceilings, and other Objects of Interest.

"'Vanishing London' is the suggestive title given by Mr. Roland Paul to a handsome volume just published by himself, and containing a series of careful drawings from his own pen." —From leading article in the Daily Telegraph.

"An attractive series of drawings." —Times.
 "Will have a real value as a record of some of the old buildings of the present day, and will probably take its place as one of the standard records of old London, to be consulted and referred to as such by future archaeologists."

Leading article in the Builder.
 "Merely as a record of what perishes day by day almost before our eyes, this book will always be valuable, but as a series of very picturesque drawings it has a second and not less permanent quality." —Full Mail Gazette.

"This attractive volume makes a useful addition to any library dealing with relics of old London."

St. James's Budget.
 "When the subjects are so well chosen as those comprised in the forty plates of this quarto, and depicted faithfully and unpretentiously, it is not easy to be sufficiently restrained in praising them." —Studio.

"No book has recently appeared which can vie in attractiveness, at least to any one with an interest in London or in domestic architecture, with Mr. Paul's 'Vanishing London'." —Journal of the Royal Institute of British Architects.

Published by the Author, ROLAND W. PAUL,
 8, Arundel-street, Strand, London, W.C.

 "NUMBER ONE'S" REVELATIONS.

THE IRISH NATIONAL INVINCIBLES AND THEIR TIMES.

With APPENDICES, INDEX, and PORTRAITS.

The Parnell-Penian Alliance—The Secret History of the Phoenix Park Murders—The Invincibles' Challenge to the Irish Members to Repudiate them now.

The Times says:—"The story of crimes which Mr. Tynan tells is not so remarkable in itself—though it throws new light upon the connexion between the open and secret movements—as it is for the spirit which animates the narrator. With that spirit English statesmanship will have to reckon, and we leave it to our readers to judge whether or not any reasonable concessions are likely to satisfy it." —The Standard says:—"A curious book. It contains part at least of the truth." —The Daily Graphic says:—"The true attitude of the paymasters of the Irish towards Home Rule is very clearly stated in unmistakable language." —The Westminster Gazette says:—"A book bound to attract the attention of the studious and the curious." —The Birmingham Daily Gazette says:—"The book is chiefly interesting for its description of the diabolical plot in which Number One played a personal part." —The Bristol Times and Mirror says:—"If any one perusing the astounding statements contained in this volume should be inclined to ask 'Can these things be true?' he should be reminded that, a few years ago, they not only could be true, but actually were true." —The enterprising publishers have done a great public service in giving it to the world." —The Western Mail says:—"Full of interesting and often of dramatic reading, with a vivid and facile pen, the story of the Invincibles is told." —The Manchester Courier says:—"There can be little question of the appreciation with which all decent people—whatever their nationality—will regard this latest illustration of the nature of the force at the back of the Home Rule movement." —The Galway Messenger says:—"It is decidedly something to be read." —The Sheffield Telegraph says:—"The Irish National Invincibles and their Times" is the book of the hour." —The Irish Times says:—"An extraordinary volume." —The Aberdeen Free Press says:—"Its tone is notable." —The Graphic says:—"This book, which purports to be written by the notorious Tynan ('Number One'), should be read by every man, woman, and child in Great Britain, if they can get over the nausea which such a blatant glorification of the most cowardly murders occasions."

SECOND SERIES, now ready in 2 vols. 32s.

The DIPLOMATIC REMINISCENCES of Lord AUGUSTUS LOFTUS,
P.C. G.C.B., 1862 to 1879.

"The Second Series of 'The Diplomatic Reminiscences of Lord Augustus Loftus' is even more interesting than the first. It is so for the reason that the events which these pages illustrate come more nearly into our own time, while they are among the most tremendous and far-reaching in the history of the world. These Reminiscences are not all of the diplomatic sort. Many pages are filled with pictures and stories of social life."

The original Painting now on view at the Guildhall.
Copies 6s. and 7s. each.

"We have from the Autotype Company a reproduction in their process of Mr. Foytner's 'Israel in Egypt' due to a monochrome copy of the picture, about 6 ft. by 2 ft., on which the painter worked with his own hands in oil, preserving the character of the figure to a marvellously happy and complete way. From this monochrome a reduced, but still large autotype copy has been published. In the absence of a line engraving we could not hope for a truer or more acceptable transcript of this intensely interesting picture, one of the most important examples of the English school."

RED and WHITE HEATHER. North Country Tales and Ballads. By ROBERT BUCHANAN, Author of 'God and the Man.'

OUTLAW and LAWMAKER. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

"A novel of high literary quality, remarkable power, and great interest. Should be one of the most widely read novels of its year." — Daily Telegraph.

MR. SADLER'S DAUGHTERS. By HUGH COLEMAN DAVIDSON.

"As a light, amusing, and somewhat farcical story, 'Mr.
Sadler's Daughters' has no little merit. The story is sufficiently entertaining, and will be relished by readers who want to be amused." — Scotsman.

The RED SHIRTS: a Tale of the Terror. By PAUL GAULOT. Translated by J. A. J.
DE VILLIERS.

"The book contains a vivid picture of the time, with its mental cruelty, its thirst for pleasure, and its total lack of all human feeling." — Star.

MONEY. By Emile Zola, Author of 'The Downfall,' &c. Translated, with a Preface, by E. A. VIZENTHALY.

"A genuine masterpiece.....unique in its power."
Court Journal.

The RED-HOUSE MYSTERY. By

The SAVOY OPERA and the SAVOYARDS. By PERCY FITZGERALD. With 60
Illustrations and Portraits. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

"The Savoy Opera's amply bears out Mr. Fitzgerald's presumption that a record of this pleasant home of song and humour would be welcome. The little volume is as complete as possible; the author has collected everything about the plays, authors, and performers that is likely to be interesting." — World.

THREE LECTURES on the VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY, delivered at the Royal Institution in March, 1884. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Member of the French Institute. 8vo. 5s.

"Professor Max Müller gives a singularly lucid and attractive account of 'the profoundest thoughts of Indian thinkers about the soul'—that is, of the Vedānta philosophy as set forth in the Upanishads. His three lectures contain not merely a learned account of the origin of the Vedānta philosophy, but a clear and succinct exposition of its ethical and spiritual content, and an instructive comparison of its teaching with that of European systems."—Times.

ON the WALLABY; or, Through the East and Across Australia. By GUY BOOTHBY. With 8 Plates and 85 Illustrations in the Text by Ben Boothby. 8vo. 12s.

"Enough of incident and of idea is supplied at first hand in this story of strange wanderings to satisfy all reasonable demands. A tale worth the telling is written with vigour and rattling good humour, and illustrated in a like spirit."—Scotsman.

The CAMEL: its Uses and Management. By Major ARTHUR GLYN LEONARD, late 2nd East Lancashire Regiment. Royal 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

"A thoroughly practical work on the soldier's camel. The author has been for sixteen years a transport officer. He has been engaged in this service in Afghanistan, South Africa, India, and the Sudan. That is in itself a credential for his book; for no one not possessed of an equable and reflective temper could have gone through his experiences and yet be enthusiastic over his branch of the profession. Yet Major Leonard's practical experience leads him to the conclusion that, of all transport animals, the camel is best for military use in the East."—Spectator.

The THING THAT HATH BEEN; or, a Young Man's Mistakes.

A Story. By A. H. GILKES, M.A., Head Master of Dulwich College, Author of 'Boys and Masters.' Crown 8vo. 6s.

MAJOR JOSHUA. A Novel. By FRANCIS FORSTER. 1 vol. crown

8vo. 6s. "A capital story. Mr. Forster's pictures of the girls Fenwick, of Valentine, and of Captain Beresford are almost as good reading as that of the Major, and this is saying a great deal. The book is eminently readable."—Scotsman.

A TRUE RELATION of the TRAVELS and PERILOUS ADVEN-TURES of MATHEW DUDGON, GENTLEMAN: wherein is truly set down the Manner of his Taking, the Long Time of his Slavery in Algiers, and Means of his Delivery. Written by Himself, and now for the first time printed. Crown 8vo. 4s.

"We confesse to a good deal of curiosity about the original MS. of this work. If it be a really old document, it was written by some one who was much under the influence of Daniel Defoe. If it be a modern imitation, it is very cleverly done."—Daily Chronicle.

FIFTY YEARS of MY LIFE

in the WORLD of SPORT at HOME and ABROAD. By SIR JOHN DUGDALE ASTLEY, Bart.

"It is not too much to say that in writing these two volumes, which he has, by permission, dedicated to the Prince of Wales, Sir John Astley has not only produced a book which will amuse and in some measure instruct the thousands who will be anxious to read it, but has at once taken his place amongst the best chroniclers of his time."—Times, May 15.

"In conclusion, we never read a book into the treasury and storehouse of which it is more impossible to give an insight by a few quotations. It is the work of a thoroughly genial and good fellow, who has seen nearly every vicissitude of life that the open air can afford, and has touched nothing without adorning it."—Daily Telegraph.

"A wholesome as well as a graceful book, full of charming and winsome touches, and written with a decided distinction of style."—Athenæum.

"It is a surprise and a refreshment in these days of morbid and melancholy heroines to meet with one so well content with life, of so cheerful a countenance as is the young lady who gives her name to Sydney Christian's novel 'Sarah.' The author has the gift of presentation, his characters stand out clearly his descriptive passages have brilliant rapidity of effect, the talk throughout is spontaneous... The charm of freshness is on the book."—Daily News.

"At last we have a story of a woman and of womanhood which may be read with satisfaction and pleasure 'Sarah a Survival' by Sydney Christian is a remarkable work in every sense. It is rarely original and not scientific. It is thoughtful and not pretentious. It is interesting as a narrative and extremely clever as a study of character. It is written in admirable English, and abounds in humor of a quiet, delectable kind. 'Sarah' is a gem, so is her old uncle Sam, who rebukes his prim and proper sister Harriet by observing that he is 'thankful to my it never enters Sarah's head to be grateful.'—World.

LITERATURE

Town Life in the Fifteenth Century. By Mrs. J. R. Green. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

Few writers of modern times have exercised more important influence upon the historical literature of this country than John Richard Green, and none have inspired more enthusiasm among their disciples. Little more than eleven years have passed since his death, and already the fruits of his work are visible. To his suggestion the Oxford Historical Society and the English Historical Review owe their existence, it may be said. Miss Kate Norgate's history of the Angevin kings was "directed by his counsels, aided by his criticisms, and encouraged by his sympathy"; and now his widow has put forth these remarkable volumes, professedly as an attempt to fulfil a promise which her lamented husband had laid upon her before he passed away. Thus it is that genius and enthusiasm do not "waste in the socket"; like other forces they are converted into light and heat for those who come after.

Mrs. Green has thrown herself into her task with a devotion above all praise. The book abounds in passages of vigorous English, rising sometimes to real eloquence. With unusual industry she has consulted the latest writers on both sides of the Channel from whom anything could be gleaned that was worth notice; and though we are surprised that the large body of evidence collected by the Royal Commission on Market Rights has been passed over in silence, yet the sources of information she quotes from or refers to would make a formidable list of authorities—such a list as every important work like this should be furnished with. If now and then theories are put forward which can hardly be accepted—as, e.g., that the "cives" and the "communitas" were different bodies in, say, the thirteenth century; if here and there assumptions are made which involve conclusions certain to lead the unwary astray; if there are—as how should there not be?—mistakes, exaggerations, or shortcomings, yet a work so fruitful in suggestion, so original in treatment, and so earnest in tone must needs lay every thoughtful reader under obligations, for the grain weighs much more than the chaff.

Nevertheless Mrs. Green seems to us to be deficient in that sympathy with the inner life of mediæval history which is a prime requisite for any inquirer into the working of those subtle processes whereby the growth and development and consolidation of municipal institutions were brought about. She seems to think that there was from the first an antagonism between town and country, when it is much nearer the truth to assert that the identity of their interests was far more strongly realized in the thirteenth century than in the nineteenth. Such antagonism, where it exists, is certainly modern. When we first meet with the borough in English history it is essentially a place of defence into which the scattered people gathered against a common danger, and, as the Bishop of Oxford taught us long ago, the walled town was only a more strictly organized form of the rural township.

As early as King John's time there was a perfect rage all over England to obtain grants of fairs and markets in every trumpery village that could afford to pay for the privilege, and during the long reign of Henry III. hundreds of these grants were made; that is, the people had begun to realize how the old limits and restrictions—the fetters of enterprise—had been borne too long; the commercial instinct was urging men everywhere to seek for larger gains beyond the diminutive area of the manor or the ten. As the new towns grew wealthier, larger, more able to make themselves heard, it was clearly inevitable that among their burghers the spokesmen of the people would be found. Yet the sentiments they expressed and the views they advocated were those of the countrymen at least as much as of the townsmen. In other words, they were less the delegates of the few than the representatives of the many.

Mrs. Green seems to regard all the efforts of the townsmen to gain advantages for themselves and the communities to which they belonged as so many instances of political sagacity or chivalrous efforts to resist oppression, to redress wrongs, and to win for the people at large some rights from which they had been shut out by tyranny or fraud. Yet what was this "Battle for Freedom," as she somewhat sententiously styles it? Freedom from what? Get rid of the glamour which so telling a phrase is always apt to cast upon facts, however ugly in themselves, and we find that this freedom was very little more than a freedom from obligations entered into cheerfully enough by the townsmen in the first instance, but readily and somewhat fiercely repudiated when they were found to be burdensome, or when the opportunity came for lightening their incidence or getting rid of them altogether.

The lord of the soil—whether he were king or bishop, abbot or noble—gave the townsmen a market in which they might carry on their trade and buy and sell and get gain. Of course, he took his rents for the stallage; if those rents increased in amount it was because the town and its trade had grown larger and larger. Meanwhile the same lord of the soil was responsible for keeping order within the limits over which his "lordship" extended; beyond it somebody else claimed the right to interfere. Quarrels arose, crimes were committed, culprits were caught red-handed. What was to be done with them? Justice had to be administered by somebody, and in the early days the townsmen looked to the lord for justice, and had to pay for it pretty dearly. Discontent increased and waxed loud. That happened which is always happening; the townsmen vociferously clamoured for cheaper law without the law's delays, and they cried, too, for something more. The stallage rents were too high, the exactions vexatious, the dues too heavy to bear. Sometimes they offered to pay a lump sum annually for the lord's rents, sometimes they would impose the betterment; by-and-by they insisted that they should have magistrates of their own and shut out even the king's justices from meddling with their affairs. In all this there is nothing heroic. The weak had become strong, and the strong had become weak; the one had become rich and the other poor. The beggars on horseback were now knights in armour.

Take a single instance. The town of Sandwich was one of the Cinque ports; for centuries it belonged to the monastery of Christ Church, Canterbury. By vigilance and enterprise the Priory made the town. It built quays, improved the harbour, provided a certain measure of defence, kept up the roads, and gradually converted a mere village into an important mart. By judicious expenditure of capital, in fact, an emporium grew up, where wealth increased for the traders and dividends for the ground landlords. In process of time the Crown coveted the property of the Priory, and a forced sale was the result. The next stage was reached when the town protested against the quitrents, insisted on getting its share of the betterment—asked, in fact, for "fair rents"—and, somehow and to some extent, bought itself off from contributing to the expense of government by the king. Coincident with this agitation for fiscal reform there was another agitation going on. The townsmen claimed the right of exercising jurisdiction over themselves. It was simply a struggle for home rule. Nothing would suffice but they must have their own police, their own county in which the king's writ would not run, and their own magistrates. In the end they got in substance what they clamoured for; and what they gained, others gained up and down the land. But the successful efforts of consistent selfishness, however much they may deserve the praise due to pertinacity and far-sighted shrewdness, hardly deserve to be regarded as proofs of nobility of aim or of lofty patriotism. "The rising municipalities," says Mrs. Green,

"were endowed with all the young and vigorous forces of the modern world; nor is there a single instance of a town where a lively trade went hand in hand with a subservient spirit, or where a temper of unconquerable audacity in commercial enterprise did not throw its exuberant force into the region of government and politics."

How could there be such an instance? "There is nothing succeeds like success," says the adage. Translate that into plainer English, and what also does it mean but this, that the same energy and audacity which bring a man or a community to a certain point of prosperity or power will be for ever pressing on a step in advance, little recking of the means used or the justice of the cause embarked in?

Clever as is the special pleading of the eleventh chapter in the first volume, it seems to us to be an eminently one-sided statement of the case of "The Towns and the Church," and, on such ex parte evidence as Mrs. Green quotes, the truth of the facts can hardly be arrived at. It is significant that when the cause came before the judges Exeter was hopelessly cast. As it was with Sandwich, so even more was it the case with Lynn that the Bishop of Norwich made the town. Its history is a mere record of the steps by which the townsmen practically robbed the bishops of their own and left them but the shadows of what they had been. It may have been dexterous, crafty, or "bound to come," but there was nothing grand or estimable about it all. The same would have been true of Exeter if the citizens could have had their way, and was true of many another town where the "unconquerable audacity" of the traders prevailed over magnates in Church or State who feebly stood upon their rights when these were threatened by the grasping hands of the party of progress. Give that party its due: but why attempt to prove that it could do no wrong?

It is a copy-book maxim that history repeats itself—at any rate, history shows that human nature changes but little from age to age. The citizens of Norwich who tried to appropriate to themselves the rents that their bailiffs claimed were but the successors of the townsmen who had grugged the king his dues generations before. The men who shirked the duty of attending theleet, and were fined for their non-attendance, had their counterpart in the Athenians who took to flight when the vernilion rope appeared in the agora; for Aristotle tells us that, when there was nothing to gain by it, people in the Greek cities would not be troubled to vote or attend the courts. The virtuous persons who waxed wroth at the thought of a rogue being able to cross the street into another liberty have not even now got rid of all their grievances. Even now they have no redress against a swindler who has been too much for them, provided he can hide himself in some foreign land where no laws of extradition are in force. It was but yesterday that certain gates and bars were removed from streets and squares in London, set up to mark the rights of large owners of property, who at their pleasure could restrict the use of the thoroughfare to the privileged few. We call things by different names, and delude ourselves into believing that they are other than they were; we shuffle the cards, but it is the same pack. Yet such pictures as we get in these volumes of the daily life of the townsmen in past ages are not only deeply interesting, but full of warning, suggestion, and instruction. Somehow the world does move on, the social fabric does rise to a higher level of intelligence—perhaps, too, even of sentiment and ethical conviction. The little communities of the Middle Ages have grown into the enormous cities of our own days; these latter may be but the former "writ large." They are that. Our hope is that they are destined to become more than mere repetitions of the past. Be it as it may, the student of politics cannot afford to neglect the study of such a work as this. Even though he must not accept it all as gospel, the solid mass of evidence deserves to be weighed with thoughtful care; nor is it any disparagement of the author or of her achievement to say by way of caution that we must read between the lines.

The Jungle Book. By Rudyard Kipling. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. KIPLING has done many good things in his time, and doubtless some of his former work is stronger than what he gives us in this attractive volume, but it is questionable whether any of his numerous "inventions" will be more widely popular than 'The Jungle Book.' For one thing, it is wholly free from a suspicion of those defects in taste which even his warmest admirers (among whom we count ourselves) have occasionally had reason to observe and deprecate in his earlier writings. For another, it treats of the natives and the animals of India in an absolutely novel way, and has the benefit of some excellent illustrations by the author's father Mr. J. L. Kipling, Mr. W. H. Drake, and Mr. P. Frenzeny. Take it altogether, with its queer stories, its clever verses, and its capital pictures, it is in every respect a most desirable possession, alike for children and their elders. The first three tales, 'Mowgli's Brothers,' 'Kaa's Hunting,' and 'Tiger-Tiger!' form a trilogy based upon the doings of the "man-cub" Mowgli, whom we fancy we have met before in the pages of another of Mr. Kipling's books. Suckled by a she-wolf, and initiated into all the secrets of the jungle by a bear and a panther called Baloo and Bagheera, Mowgli is an altogether fascinating creation—a woodland personage of singular aptitudes and undeniable charm. How he is carried off over the tree-tops by the ridiculous Bandar-log, or Monkey People; how his two friends, assisted by Kaa, the great rock-python, succeed in effecting his rescue; how he finally leaves the forest and goes to dwell with mankind; and how he slays and skins his old enemy Shere Khan the tiger, our readers must discover for themselves. It is a veritable Odyssey of adventure, with thrilling developments at every turn. Here is a description of the Lost City known as the Cold Lair, and inhabited intermittently by the Bandar-log, in Mr. Kipling's happiest manner:—

"A great roofless palace crowned the hill, and the marble of the courtyards and the fountains was split, and stained with red and green, and the very cobblestones in the courtyard where the King's elephants used to live had been thrust up and apart by grasses and young trees. From the palace you could see the rows and rows of roofless houses that made up the city looking like empty honey-combs filled with blackness; the shapeless block of stone that had been an idol, in the square where four roads met; the pits and dimples at street-corners where the public wells once stood, and the shattered domes of temples with wild figs sprouting on their sides. The monkeys called the place their city, and pretended to despise the Jungle-People because they lived in the forest. And yet they never knew what the buildings were made for nor how to use them. They would sit in circles on the hall of the King's council-chamber, and scratch for fleas, and pretend to be men; or they would run in and out of the roofless houses and collect pieces of plaster and old tricks [bricks?] in a corner, and forget where they had hidden them, and fight and cry in scuffling crowds, and then break off to play up and down the terraces of the King's garden, where they would shake the rose-trees and the oranges in sport, to see the fruit and flowers fall. They explored all the passages and dark tunnels in the palace and the hundreds of little dark rooms, but they never remembered what they had seen and what they had not; and so drifted about in ones and twos or crowds, telling each other that they were doing as men did. They drank at the tanks and made the water all muddy, and then they fought over it, and then they would all rush together in mobs and shout: 'There is no one in the jungle so wise and good and clever and strong and gentle as the Bandar-log.' Then all would begin again till they grew tired of the city, and went back to the tree-tops, hoping the Jungle-People would notice them."

The incidental pictures of Indian native life and habits are drawn with a master hand. We may instance the account Mr. Kipling gives of the buffaloes being driven to graze from the village by the children in the early morning, the long, sleepy, sunshiny days passed by the young herdsmen, and the tramp back again in the evening across the monotonous grey plain. It is worth notice, by the way, that among the occupations he specifies for these "hours of idleness" is that of weaving little baskets of dried grass and putting grasshoppers within them, which vividly recalls the careless watcher of the vineyard in the first Idyll of Theocritus:—

αὐτὰρ ὅγ' ἀθερίκεσσι καλὰν πλίκαι ἀκριδο-θήκαν σχόιν' ἐφαρμόσων· μίλειται δὲ οἱ οὔτε τι πύρρος οὔτε φιδῶν ταυσηῖον, ὅσον περὶ πλίσματι γαθεί.

Indeed, as we have had occasion to remark before when writing of Mr. Kipling's Indian stories, the resemblance between these unsophisticated inhabitants of the "village communities" of the East—with their picturesque yet dignified speech, and old-world courtesy and simplicity—and the men and women of the Greek poets, is often so strong as to make the classical reader start with surprise.

'The White Seal' attracted a good deal of attention when it first appeared, in view of the Behring Sea arbitration, now happily concluded, and was well worth reprinting. 'Rikki-Tikki-Tavi' is a delicious story of the achievements of a mongoose, which rides a house and compound of snakes in the most business-like manner. But best of all, in imaginative scope and descriptive power, we hold to be 'Toomai of the Elephants.' The account of the night journey of Kala Nag and his tiny rider to the "Tanz-Platz" of these mysterious quadrupeds is simply stupendous. We tender our sincere thanks to Mr. Kipling for the hour of pure and unadulterated enjoyment which he has given us, and many another reader, by this inimitable 'Jungle Book.'

Things I have Seen and People I have Known.
By George Augustus Sala. 2 vols.
(Cassell & Co.)

MR. SALA is writing an autobiography, and in this foretaste of it he says, "I have done my best to present my own individuality only in the form of a peg on which objects of real interest may be suspended." The "peg," however, is much more prominent, and often more interesting, than are the "objects" suspended on it. Mr. Sala tells us, though not in chronological order, a great deal about himself and his doings. Thackeray and Dickens, who are the professed themes of the earlier and most entertaining chapters, chiefly figure in them as friends and patrons of the young scene-painter and engraver who by their help became a writer, and all the other things and people he describes are merely introduced as subsidiary to his self-portrait. Mr. Sala has turned out better books of the same class, and its class does not take a high place in literature; still it is readable.

The reminiscences of Dickens date far back. In 1836 Mr. Sala's mother was playing in 'The Village Coquettes,' John Hullah's opera, for which the author of 'Pickwick' had written the words, and the lad of ten, allowed behind the scenes, had his first sight of Box, then "a very young gentleman, with long brown hair falling in silky masses over his temples." It was not till 1851, however, that the intimacy began. Mr. Sala had before that time dabbled a little in magazine work, but he had "lost faith in his ability to write anything that anybody would care to read" when he was persuaded to offer an article to the editor of Household Words. The article was accepted and paid for within four hours of its being sent in, and others were bespoken. Mr. Sala became a regular contributor, and the money he earned by supplying one or two sketchy papers every week for four or five years enabled him to be "an out-and-out Bohemian," spending nearly as much time in Paris as in London, and enjoying life none the less because he was generally in a state of "comic hard-upness." His account of the straits in which he and his companions found themselves is amusing:—

"I, for one, knew that there was little use of applying too frequently for remittances to worthy Mr. W. H. Wills, Dickens's assistant-editor. He was a long-suffering controller of the cash-box, and would let you overdraw to the extent of, say, twenty pounds. After that he would write you a humorous note, which did not contain a cheque, but which hinted that it was a law of the Medes and Persians at the office of Household Words that, before any more money was transmitted to you, a certain commodity called 'copy' must have been received in Wellington Street, Strand. I have not the slightest shame in mentioning these little facts; because, in after life, it has been my lot to pay 'money on account' for considerable sums to a great many people, many of whom, owing doubtless to some strange phenomenon of memory, forgot to repay me. But, let me hasten to say that, although we young Anglo-Parisian Cockneys, Bohemians to the backbone as we were, had perforce to defer to the decision of Mr. W. H. Wills in Wellington Street, we rarely failed to find that when Charles Dickens was in Paris he became at once the smiling captive of our bow and spear. He knew well enough that he would get the necessary

'copy' out of us sooner or later; although, at the end of one exceptionally disastrous financial year, when I was no less than seventy pounds to the bad, he laughingly suggested that a sponge should be applied to the slate, and that then 'we could begin again' quite comfortably. I need scarcely say that I at once and unreservedly acquiesced in this cheery proposal."

Seeing how much Mr. Sala owed to Dickens, the rather scornful patronage bestowed on him in these pages is hardly in good taste. Of the author of 'Vanity Fair' Mr. Sala speaks somewhat more respectfully, but this benefactor also is laughed at as well as praised in the long chapter of small talk which is entitled "The Real Thackeray."

Mr. Sala gossips freely concerning many of his other friends and acquaintances, some of them still living; but he is most instructive in his account of the shady phases of life, in London as well as in Paris, with which he was well acquainted a generation or more ago. One chapter is about money-lenders and their ways; another treats of the now-abolished spunging-houses and debtors' prisons; a third describes the "fast life" of which he was, at any rate, an interested observer in his youth and early manhood:—

"My dear mother was something more than a distinguished teacher of Italian singing. She was a gentlewoman of high culture and great intellectual gifts. She knew everybody in society; and her drawing-room was a real salon, in which might be found not only the great lords and ladies of the age—not only the leading representatives of literature and art, but all the wits and the beaux, the dandies, and the gay young fellows of the time. In 1836-7 young gentlemen who habitually drank too much champagne and too much brandy, frequented common gaming-houses, beat the police or got beaten by them and were locked up in the station-house for the night, were only termed 'a little wild,' and they were not ostracised from society. From that society, in these more refined days, I suppose, 'Johnnies' and 'Chappies' who, like Hans Breitmann's bush-whacker, 'raise Cain and break things,' are inexorably banished. It happened that we lived in a first floor in the Regent's Quadrant, and, at the time of which I speak, the entresol beneath was occupied by Mr. Charles L—, who was, perhaps, the wildest young dog about town of that fiercely wild epoch. He was supremely handsome—handsome even for a period when Count Alfred d'Orsay was the model of male comeliness in London. His apparel was gorgeous even for a time when gentlemen wore two or three coloured and white under-waistcoats and an over-vest of velvet or rich brocade, with a long gold chain meandering over it, and above it a high satin stock adorned by two jewelled breastpins united by a thin chain of gold—a time when young Mr. Benjamin Disraeli moved in patrician circles in black velvet pantaloons and with ruffles at his wrists. Mr. Charles L— had run through a couple of fortunes, one of which at least had been squandered over French hazard at Crockford's. He was very well educated, very urbane, nay, almost fascinating in his manner; and he usually came home about four o'clock in the morning either boisterously, lyrically, pugilistically, or maniacally drunk. When he did not return to the entresol his manservant used to opine that his master had reached the incapable stage of intoxication, and that he had been conveyed on a stretcher to St. James's Watchhouse, just round the corner; and he would philosophically proceed to wait upon him there with a change of linen and a small silver flask full of brandy. After a few seasons spent in the manner at which I have hinted, Mr. Charles L— married an Anglo-Indian widow of immense wealth."

Other neighbours and visitors of the Sala household are as precisely described, and there is much else that is curious in this book of "confidences" which Mr. Sala takes credit to himself for giving to the world as something superior to the 'Confessions' by means of which "it was the morbid whim of half-crazy Jean Jacques Rousseau to convert himself, figuratively speaking, into a bat, and to nail himself to his own barn-door for all the world to wonder, to jeer, and to be disgusted at."

A Journey through the Yemen and some General Remarks upon that Country. By Walter B. Harris, F.R.G.S. (Blackwood & Sons.)

CONTRARY to the order adopted on the title-page, Mr. Harris's "general remarks" take up the first part of the present publication, or nearly one-third of the whole volume; while his personal experiences of travel form the staple of the remainder. In the former he supplies an historical, political, and general, rather than a geographical review of the province "in the south-west corner of Arabia" which he has selected for his theme; and he may be credited with a fair performance of his task of elucidation and exposition, even though the lighter style of the "correspondent" sometimes predominate over the graver mood of the serious writer of books. While pronouncing his second chapter to be more suggestive than exhaustive in its treatment of ancient dynasties, we must at the same time admit that the mere archaeological questions involved merit a much larger space than the few pages into which they are now compressed. Saba and the Sabæans are a great mystery. The Minaean dynasty of kings has yet to find a place in history; and the visit of the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon has already been so productive of learned discussion that any fresh speculation thereon can only hope for favour and acceptance when all former theories shall have been declared defective. Mr. Harris, in deciding that the queen must have been a native of South Arabia, merely confirms a conclusion generally received—the name of her country, Sheba, having been replaced in later years by "Himyar," which, from its root "hamr," seems to connect it with the Red Sea, or Arabic "Bahrul Ahamr." Discrepancy of date alone cannot suffice, as suggested by the writer, to separate this monarch from the "Balkis" or "Bilqis" of the Kurán; while Sala's notion that the two may be identified as one Queen of Sab'a, or Sheba, has hardly been disproved by the judgment of the present generation. Father Lobo's dissertation on this subject, in his 'Voyage Historique d'Abyssinie,' may be mentioned as worthy of reference, although written nearly two centuries ago. To find, however, a good starting-point for a bibliography of Sab'a, we should have to revert to the writers of a much earlier period. If the story of the Sabæans be added to that of the Joktanite kingdom, the field of research would be all the more interesting and instructive.

The second division of the book under notice commences with an admirable description of Aden, and it may be recommended to travellers, before or after visiting the Gibraltar of the East, or to stay-at-home readers who are content to learn something definite and true on regions they may never hope or care to see. Lifelike indeed is the following picture:—

"What a night the bazars of Aden present on an evening! Often and often I would drive out just to spend the last hour or two of daylight in idly sauntering through its streets. What strange peoples are to be seen there! Indians gorgeous in scarlet and gold and tinsel; Somalis in their plain white tobes, their hair left long and hanging like the cords of a Russian poodle on either side of their heads, and often their raven locks are dyed a strange brick-dust red colour by a clay they smear over them; Arabs, too, with long black silky curls bursting from under their small turbans, nude fellows, except for their loin-cloth of native dyed indigo cotton, the colour of which clings to their copper skins with strange effect; creeping, crawling Jews; niggers from Zanzibar; Persians and Arabs from Bagdad; Parsees and Greeks. Then is the time, when the heat of the day is over, to seek some café at the corner of a street, and watch the people pass. Here at a table four Somali warriors, glorious in their very blackness, are playing dominoes with the manners of bourgeois on the boulevards; there a group of Arabs are chatting over a hubbub-pipe, the mouthpiece of which they pass one to another, over cups of the husks of the coffee-berry, their favourite beverage. Great strings of camels pass and repass in the street. Rickety cabs rattle along, the drivers calling to the crowd to make way; and throughout the whole permeates Tommy Atkins, sublime in his self-consciousness, and a very good fellow withal. Ay, the bazars of an evening are a sight to be seen,—a collection of strange peoples, only to be equalled perhaps on the bridge between Stamboul and Galata at Constantinople."

Altogether the narrative of the journey from Aden to Sanaa, and from Sanaa to Hodaidah, is pleasantly told, and the accompaniment of clever illustrations and bright letter-press, which made it suitable to a periodical, should recommend it in no less a degree to Mudie's subscribers. Here and there the reader comes upon an episode of romantic adventure which cannot fail to interest. Perhaps none is more characteristic or better described than the following. The scene is laid at Bait Said, a village about a hundred miles north of Aden; time, night:—

"I had been asleep only an hour or two when I felt myself quietly shaken. I asked who was there. A voice whispered in my ear, 'Hush! do not speak.' I struck a light, and as a wild long-haired creature leant over me to blow it out, I had just time to see that the man was a stranger. 'Get up,' said the voice again; 'you are in danger. Not a word, mind. Give me your bedding and carpet.' In the dark I hurried into my clothes, while the unknown seized my carpet and such baggage as I possessed, and left. I waited for a few moments, when he returned. 'Your mules are already being laden,' he continued; then seizing me by the hand, added, 'Follow me.' I followed him out into the quiet moonlit streets, and keeping under the shadows of the houses, left the village. Here I was surprised to find my mules already laden. No one was stirring, and in the bright moonlight we passed silently away from the place without disturbing a soul. Our road was a difficult and a steep one: at many places the track, under two feet wide, was cut into the side of a precipice, far down which we could see the white mists hovering over the damp valley."

The reason for flight was not apparent, but the mysterious stranger was trusted, and proved worthy of trust. Our author could not have proceeded far on his new journey when, an hour or so after midnight, he reached the village of Sök-al-Thuluth. Here he was put into "a cave-like room with a stone arched ceiling, reeking with the pungent odours of strong tobacco and coffee," in which a fire, hot water, and resting-place were prepared in his honour; but to these he preferred his own bed made up on the roof, and there fell asleep. Awakening soon after dawn with a consciousness that all danger was over, he bade his servant send him the man to whom he was indebted for safety, but he was not forthcoming:—

"He had gone! Never a word of thanks, never a reward! He had left me sleeping, and gone back to his own affairs and to his own life. Like the character in some play that appears but once, so had this Arab come and gone. My men had tried to stop him, had tried to keep him until I awoke, promising him a reward, but he had laughed and shaken his raven curls, and, spear in hand, girded up his loins and vanished. Strange good fellow! he saved my life, and never even gave me the opportunity of thanking him!"

The fact is that the road taken had been a by-path. Had they followed the main road, in the ordinary course of things, they would have found forty men armed to the teeth, bent on plunder and other mischief.

Mr. Harris's favourable opinion of the Turkish café will, doubtless, be shared by many of his fellow travellers, even though it be found in so remote a quarter of the Ottoman dominions as Northern Yemen. He has left Sanaa, and is on the road to Hodaidah under escort of two soldiers:—

"At the café of Metneh we stopped for our midday meal. A large, low, stone building forms the caravanserai, both for man and beast. The place is roughly built, one storey in height, the roof being supported on arches and stone columns, round the bases of which are little raised platforms, on one of which we spread our carpet and rested for a time. The café was nearly full of Turkish troops, poor, ill-fed, and ill-clad fellows, but the very acme of good-humour. It was amusing to hear them discussing my presence with some Arab merchants who happened to be there at the same time. The conclusion they arrived at was that the presence of a Christian in the country foretold the downfall of the Yemen, and the sooner they, the Moslems, cleared out of it the better. It was flattering certainly to hear one's self considered of such vital importance to a country the size of the Yemen; nor did the fact that I was a prisoner in the hands of a Turkish guard seem to lessen their opinion of me. On discovering at length that I spoke Arabic we joined parties and lunched together, and very polite they all were. The group was a strange one, representing in the Arabs the rebel party, in the Turks the conquerors and oppressors, and last, but not least, in my humble self the future of the Yemen (for so they deemed my presence to foretell). Yet we were a merry band, and shared the same hubbub-bubble of peace, and parted with protestations of profound respect and friendship for one another. One of the pleasantest recollections of the Yemen that I bore away with me is, and always will be, the hours spent in these wayside cafés. Then more than at any other time one saw the people as they really are. Then all restraint was thrown aside; there was exhibited none of the suspicion we habitually show to fellow-travellers; and often we unburdened our aims and ideas to one another, the Arabs and I. As I write of it I long once more to go back, to sit cross-legged on the floor and sip the beverage of coffee-husks from the tiny Japanese and Chinese cups the Yemenis love so much, and listen to the patient murmur of the hubbub-bubble amongst a group of half-naked Arabs."

It is refreshing to find an Englishman ready to set aside those innate prejudices which, blinding him from the first to any good points in the character of Arab and Turk, are not always removed by continuous association with individuals of either nationality. The Western idea of the former is, as a rule, favourable, when derived from the pages of novel and romance; for we then think of him as a son of the desert, brave, chivalrous, and hospitable—one whose marauding propensities are extenuated by the mode in which they are exercised and the crude civilization of Bedouin homes. But this estimate cannot be indiscriminately applied to the whole population of the Arabian Peninsula, certainly not to Egypt and Aden in their modern aspect; and it is in the last-named localities that our countrymen obtain their chief experience of the Arab. Plainly, they must take him as they find him, and not criticize too closely, if at all, from a European standpoint. In like manner with the Turk. In official intercourse with Western states his shuffling and dilatoriness are beyond measure provoking; as a conqueror and administrator of a conquered people, he excites horror by his acts of savage and unscrupulous cruelty, which have long been, and unfortunately continue to be, historical. But if we widen the range of inquiry there are certainly many redeeming features. As for the soldiery, one of whom Mr. Harris discovered seated on his bed, smoking a cigarette, they take the cue to their conduct from their officers and a happy-go-lucky system in which discipline, if severe, is also spasmodic. Under other control they might become a model army, but that control must be absolute, not the half-measure of control adopted for increasing the number of the allied forces during the Crimean war.

It is impossible to congratulate Mr. Harris on his consistency of transcription with respect to Arabic names, whatever may be said of the general principles adopted. To take one page only (65), if "Turkchee" and "Zebeed" are right, then why should not "Ali" and "Wahabi" be "Alee" and "Wahabee"? In like manner, should "Mamlook" be correct, why not "Toork" also? And upon what plea is "Mahammed" substituted for the commonly received "Mohammed," or, better still, the strictly accurate "Muhammad"? We had hoped that these and so were by this time fairly obsolete in these transliterations. Allusion is very properly made to the service rendered to Oriental students by Mr. H. O. Kay in his valuable translation of Omara's 'Yaman,' with its accompaniments from Ibn Khaldun and Al Janudi—a work which, if we mistake not, as it has aided Mr. Harris's researches, will eventually become a book of reference for many students.

The Diary of a Cavalry Officer in the Peninsular and Waterloo Campaigns, 1809-1815. By the late Lieut.-Col. William Tomkinson. Edited by his Son, J. Tomkinson. (Sonnenschein & Co.)

FROM works like the one before us the military historian obtains some of his most valuable materials, for the writer of a journal kept on active service not only describes the events in which he took part, but also reflects current opinion in the army. Of course much depends upon the character of the diarist. To be in the highest degree useful he ought to be calm, observant, and impartial, and he should occupy a position in which he sees much of what is going on. Col. Tomkinson seems to have been qualified in these respects as a chronicler of the campaigns in which he took part.

Born in 1790, and gazetted to a cornetcy in the 16th Light Dragoons in December, 1807, he embarked for the Peninsula in April, 1809; and on the 11th of May he was wounded in four places in a skirmish during the advance on Oporto. Invalided to England, he returned in March of the following year and rejoined his regiment, which was employed in outpost duty on the Agueda under Crawford. Crawford's force obtained all its food and forage from the country, taking what was needed and giving receipts, which were paid when presented, and the captain commanding Tomkinson's troop was, we are told, rather summary in his proceedings. So

"a commissary was sent to Villa Franca to inquire into the complaints of the peasants. We asked him to dinner, and gave him as much wine as he wished, when he said the complaints were groundless."

The British cavalry won in the Peninsula a good name for intrepidity; and Col. Tomkinson supplies incidentally many proofs that its reputation for daring was deserved. For instance, during Massena's invasion of Portugal parties were sent out from the 16th Light Dragoons to seek for French marauders:—

"Sergeant Liddle of Capt. Belli's troop, belonging to Cocks' squadron, was sent from Alqueñtre with four men on patrol round by Rio Mayor. He fell in with an officer and fifteen French infantry, and having followed them for some way, attacked them, when they all surrendered. Sergeant Baxter was sent on patrol from the brigade with four men to the left. He met with an infantry piquet of the enemy's, stationed in a house with their arms piled in front, and got so near unobserved that he thought he might get to the arms before they could take them up. He galloped forward; they had time to turn out, gave him a volley, wounding one of his men. It was too late to turn back; he persisted in his charge, rode up to the enemy, who laid down their arms, he killing one man. In all, forty-one men and an officer, which number he marched in..... Sergeant Nichols, of Capt. Cocks' troop, took sixteen infantry with six men.....though I think they were glad to find an English party to save them from the peasantry."

A little further on Col. Tomkinson remarks:—

"The spirit of capturing and attacking the enemy's parties is very great, and the only fear is of not falling in with them—the men not regarding their numbers. A sergeant and two dragoons took eighteen infantry."

Here and there we find many passages which explain the dread which small parties of the French entertained of the peasantry, and fully account for the virulence of the latter:—

"An orderly book of the enemy's, found near the convent of Battalia, gives the number of infantry daily employed in the destruction of the building. They either burn or destroy every town and village they pass through, and we daily see poor wretches of inhabitants in the most miserable state. They kill many, whose bodies we see in each day's march.....The enemy press the peasants as guides, and when at the end of their day's march, shoot them to prevent them giving us information."

How worthless some of the Spanish officers were at that time is shown by the following incident. Tomkinson was sent out on patrol from his piquet with four men, when he came across "a plundering party of 200 infantry with about four file of cavalry. The infantry had half of them arms, the other without to carry provisions." Two hundred Spanish infantry were sent to drive this party out of a village which they were plundering while the cavalry piquet co-operated. The Spaniards, moving through enclosures, showed themselves too soon, and the enemy escaped with the loss of one man killed and another wounded and made prisoner. "All the Spanish officers excepting one boy remained behind; and had the men been properly commanded, more might have been done."

Of the Portuguese, too—who were armed, equipped, and clothed by our Government, and commanded to a great extent by British officers—the opinion of the British army was rather unfavourable. Writing on the day before the battle of Busaco, Tomkinson remarks, speaking of the French: "They may calculate that the Portuguese troops, of which the greater part of the army is composed, will run away." On the day of the battle, when describing the action, he says:—

"The Portuguese brigade of the division [the 3rd] was, at first, rather unsteady; but seeing the British move forward, they advanced too, and behaved extremely well. With the Light Division the Caçadores did well, and the day gave the Portuguese confidence in themselves and with the army in general."

So well, indeed, did the Portuguese behave that the French paid them (so the diarist says) the compliment of thinking that they were British troops dressed in blue.

Returning to England in the autumn of 1813, eighteen months later our author took part in the Waterloo campaign. Some of his remarks are interesting, especially those about the cavalry fight at Genappe, in which, however, Marbot declares that the advantage remained with his gallant countrymen:—

"Lord Uxbridge ordered the 7th Hussars to attack a regiment of French Lancers. The enemy were formed across the street, and in this position were charged by the 7th. The men rode up most gallantly and attempted to drive them back, cutting at them with their sabres, the enemy holding their lances before their horses. The men of the 7th, from all I could hear, behaved well, but were obliged to retire unsuccessful. The French then advanced out of the village, when the 1st Life Guards were brought down and charged. They advanced most gallantly, and the enemy ran away before the Life Guards got up to them. They were, from what I could learn, within about 100 yards when the enemy went about, and though the French were awed by their appearance, and ran away before they came near them, yet the charge [change?] was entirely attributed to the superior strength of the Life Guards and weight in riding down the enemy. Nothing could be better done than the charge, yet, I much question, had the Life Guards attacked in the situation the 7th attempted, if they would have succeeded."

The editor, Major Tomkinson, is guilty of an error in correcting in a foot-note his father's statement that Sir William Ponsonby was killed at Waterloo. The note runs, "Happily this proved incorrect." As a matter of fact, Sir William Ponsonby was killed, while it was his namesake, Lieut.-Col. Ponsonby of the 12th Light Dragoons, who escaped with a severe wound. Col. Tomkinson, in mentioning the well-known fact that towards the end of the day Lord Edward Somerset's or the Household Brigade, consisting of thirteen squadrons, or a little over 1,300 men, could only muster one squadron, remarks:—

"It could not be supposed so few remained over the killed and wounded. The fact was that the men did not know where to assemble after the charge, and this being the first action they had ever been in, they, I suppose, fancied that nothing remained for them to attend to after this one attack, and many went in consequence to the rear. There was one squadron of the 1st Dragoon Guards in which not above one or two returned. They rode completely into the enemy's reserve, and were killed. The enemy, I suspect, did not spare a single prisoner who fell into their hands. It is impossible to suppose a whole squadron killed without one man surrendering."

An amusing instance of excitement acting on a vainglorious disposition is related of Waterloo. Sir Hussey Vivian's brigade never charged till the victory had been decided and the French army was retreating in disorder, yet at the close of the day Sir Hussey made the following statement to Col. (then Capt.) Tomkinson:—

"Sir Hussey told me he had turned the fate of the day by charging with his brigade. The place he charged at was two miles out of the position and half an hour after the enemy retired."

The sketch maps by the diarist are useful, but the absurd little map of Spain and Portugal inserted by the publishers would disgrace a shilling guide-book.

NEW NOVELS.

The Potter's Thumb. By Flora Annie Steel. 3 vols. (Heinemann.)

OF-REPEATED and very sincere expressions of pleasure at Mrs. Steel's sympathetic and charming sketches of life in India need not prevent her admirers from noting what seems like a slight falling off in the quality of her work in 'The Potter's Thumb.' 'Miss Stuart's Legacy,' a clever novel, also in three volumes, showed that she is less at ease when attempting an elaborate novel than in short artistic stories. 'The Flower of Forgiveness' and others are sufficient proof of this. 'The Potter's Thumb' has naturally many fine touches, and much insight into, and understanding of, those difficult problems of native rights and wrongs that underlie administration which seems direct and simple enough to the uninitiate. Yet, if we might venture to suggest it, there may be too much insistence on native plottings and intrigue, however cleverly conveyed.

In this instance the ins and outs are a little laboured and confused, and help to make 'The Potter's Thumb' almost dull reading in places, in spite of some manifestly good handiwork. As we have said so much, we may add that most of the Europeans of the story seem less well handled and less interesting than Mrs. Steel has taught the reader to expect they should be. The knack of elimination, so conspicuous in her treatment of episodic situations, is seemingly absent in her longer novels. They have a tendency to repetitions, and an over-free if clever use of local colour. There is just a hint of something slightly mechanical and indiscriminating, a multiplication of details and of people where fewer figures and a simpler method would be more satisfying. On the opening of a sluice-gate at Hodinuggur, and the bribery and corruption that centre about it and affect the lives and loves of Europeans and Orientals, hangs the tale. We must confess that it does not affect us so powerfully as the main incidents might in their nature be expected to do. The plot is a little obscure and wearying, and the general aspect of the book—as compared with others by the same author—a trifle disappointing.

Claudia. By Frances Courtenay Baylor. 3 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

Or late years the American heroine has been pretty continuously in evidence, but we think it may be safely stated that no such paragon as Claudia Hyde has ever exercised the eulogistic energies of any modern novelist. As for Gerald Midway's heroic procrastination in putting his fortune to the test, the reader will be at a loss to know whether to admire or reprobate it the more. But this delay is thoroughly characteristic of an author whose personages are one and all afflicted with inordinate loquacity. They do not talk, they perorate. As for the comic Irishman, it positively deafens one to read him. This serious and ever-present blemish is the more to be regretted inasmuch as the author's pictures of the amenities of Virginian life are clever as well as genial.

Henry Standon; or, Loss's Debt to Duty. By D'Arcy Drew. 3 vols. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

'HENRY STANDON' may be described as about the most wearisome and futile thousand pages ever written, or at any rate printed. To skim through them from a sense of duty is all a critic can do; to read them thoroughly is a task beyond any mortal's patience. Dozens of wooden people turn up one after another, and are described—especially their whiskers—for no apparent reason. The tiresome after-dinner discussions in which these people indulge would never be allowed even to begin in real life. The book is a compound of guide-book and Family Herald of the old kind, with a dash of cheap science not even up to date. And yet the proud author actually threatens to continue "this brief history of the trials of a few human hearts, some of whom have passed out of our immediate purview." One of these "hearts," we remember—a female one, with "equanimity to meet experiences of refined social life"—on an important occasion,

"smiled no more than any other lady would have done." We will not swear to it, but it may have been at the house of this well-appointed person that "an abundance of fluids to accommodate divergencies of inclination" was provided.

Miss Precocity. By Charles T. C. James. 2 vols. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

If we remember right, Mr. James's stories as a rule differ more in their matter than manner. Many obviously Dickens-like clichés beset his writings. In 'Miss Precocity' almost every one has his or her peculiar or ludicrous tricks of manner or speech. These are too much insisted on. One young lady—she never comes to anything in particular—is given to unspeakable "writhings" and yearnings that cannot be uttered. Her father's "loose mouth" and "elephantine air" are always to the front, so are her brother's eyeglasses and his catchwords. Adverse criticism does not end with them. In some respects little Miss Precocity herself will really not do. A child of only eight years old may, under certain circumstances, develop into something strangely mature and circumspect, but not, we believe, into quite such an odd figure as Dorothea Marston's. Occasionally her dignified speech and attitudes, and particularly her relations with her servants and theirs with her, are amusing, but in some ways she does not hold together. The child who dispenses afternoon tea and converses in staid fashion with visitors in her ancestral home, and who presides at a wholly impossible dinner party, is not the child who fraternizes with the son of the parish priest, nor is she in her turn the child to whom we are introduced in poor London lodgings. And her chosen companion, the boy Harry, is not really amusing in spite of the author's intentions. Evidences of questionable taste, and some ignorance of what a certain Mrs. Reno has termed "the manners of society," are rather too apparent in places. Notwithstanding what we have said, a good deal of cleverness and originality is scattered about.

In the Face of the World. By Alan St. Aubyn. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

TRISTRAM LUSHINGTON, the hero of Mr. Alan St. Aubyn's new novel, "inherited from his mother her high narrow forehead, and her pale, clear-cut face, and her abundant fair hair—he wore it long, and it curled over the collar of his coat, and over his narrow forehead, like a post." But the worst of it was that he had no right to look like a poet, for he was the eldest son of an enormously rich London brewer. And being further endowed with a super-sensitive nature and strong views on the question of temperance, the sequel may be readily guessed, especially when it is taken into account that the book is dedicated to Archdeacon Farrar. Mr. Alan St. Aubyn, as a writer of fiction, is a faithful disciple of the author of 'Eric.' One may credit him with the most admirable motives, and yet deplore the appalling sloppiness of his sentiment. To read such a book is, as it were, to wallow in a literary pomatum pot. On the second page of the first volume the author alludes to Oliver Wendell Holmes as "the dear old Autocrat."

Victims of Fashion. By A. M. Grange. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

So cleverly planned and neatly told a story would be worth reading even if it contained fewer good character sketches and more foolish remarks than are scattered by the way in 'Victims of Fashion.' The title is not alluring, and the author has indulged in a good deal of stereotyped nonsense about birth, blood, coronets, ermine robes, and other somewhat obsolete stage properties. A touchingly ingenuous faith, too, is displayed with regard to the divine rights and qualities of county families. A curious naïveté on these points is combined with an evidently wide knowledge of the world; and a certain acrimoniousness in all the remarks about Americans leads one to suppose that the writer has fewer illusions about Transatlantic than about English society. The mysterious brother and sister from South Carolina, who come to lay their particular siege to London, are very well drawn, and their social adventures are told with great skill and restraint. The gentle maiden aunt, Lady Margaret, is a charming sketch, and her subjugation, in middle age, by the beautiful American adventurer is touched with delicate pathos and without cheap ridicule. Lady Cannington, on the other hand, is an unskilful caricature. But Fanny Wilmer and Bobby are natural young people. The author's standpoint is a little outside the ordinary groove, and there is a freshness about the story which gives even its crudities a certain picturesqueness.

The Story of a Modern Woman. By Ella Hepworth Dixon. (Heinemann.)

THE title of Miss Hepworth Dixon's story is unnecessarily forbidding, for her heroine has little in common with the self-assertive, heartless, sexless thing whom various writers have recently brought into fashion, and almost tempted the public to regard, as the typical modern woman. On the contrary, Mary Erle is a gentle and essentially feminine creature, who only took to journalism and a solitary life in London lodgings owing to the stress of outward circumstances after the death of her father, Prof. Erle. She knew no inward "call" to forsake home ties and duties in order to lead a higher life and to get her own way. There is no "modernity" in her. She meekly accepts her role as a failure in life; gives up drawing badly; makes what money she can by writing in a second-rate fashion; and loses her lover through his weakness, and her dearest friend through death, with no touch of wounded vanity or bitterness in her sorrow. There is little "modernity" in such resignation. Vincent Hemming is a clever outline, and Alison Ives a fairly convincing study of a brilliant young lady with a taste for violent social contrasts which is decidedly more "up to date" than her friend's attitude of mind. There is a quiet charm about the character of Mary which would have been heightened if her creator had treated her with less of the seriousness and copiousness of a biographer. The anecdotes of her childhood might well be spared. It is an ungraceful habit to refer to any poor heroine as "the girl" so many times on every page, and really at last suggests maid-of-all-work associations.

Stanhope of Chester: a Mystery. By Percy Andros. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

'STANHOPE OF CHESTER' is an odd book, not easy to classify. Perhaps the most definite thing to say about it is that we were obliged to finish it, and that interest of a fluctuating kind accompanied the reading. It is devoid (perhaps purposely) of beauty, grace, or charm of manner, but not altogether of power. Though the book announces itself as "a mystery"—is, in fact, unwise enough to give "bold advertisement" of its contents—it really has a mystery. The bald, direct, and singularly uneffusive manner of the commonplace, kind-hearted business man who tells the story rather helps than hinders the sense of mystification. There is no need to reveal what the mystery is, or to mention anything about it beyond the fact that it was taken up by the police. It seems to us it should have been put into the able hands of the Psychical Research Society—to whom we commend it. The story is in some ways poorly constructed and worked out, and there is not a pennyworth of style anywhere. Still, as has been said, there is the mystery. Some may be bored by it, others disappointed; a few will be neither. We confess that for more than the turn of a moment the sense of the supernatural and the eerie was upon us—the feeling that the writer had at least got hold of a good thing in "shockers," though he did not always know how to pull the strings.

Le Amanti. By Matilde Serao. (Milan, Fratelli Treves.)

It is much to be deplored that Matilde Serao has of late debased her very real talent by writing books of a coarse and trivial character. 'Gli Amanti,' a highly indecorous publication, did her little honour, and reflected small honour also on the public who could relish such equivocal literature. Encouraged, however, by the success this book undoubtedly met with in her native land, the author has followed it up with a sequel, 'Le Amanti,' a volume in which there is not depicted one healthy sentiment, one action that is not contrary to the moral law. If a foreigner were to judge Italian society from Matilde Serao's late books, he would deem that in it vice is cultivated for its own sake.

TRANSLATIONS.

THE merit of novels which have chosen the French Revolution for their theme has not usually been singularly great, and their modest level is fairly attained by The Red Shirts (Chatto & Windus), which has been translated from the French of M. Paul Gault by Mr. J. A. J. De Villiers. M. Gault has paid special attention to Revolution history, and a very large proportion of his characters are historical. The immediate subject is the Batz conspiracy, best known to most readers as connected with the fate of Madame de Sainte-Annanthe and of Cécile Renault. This M. Gault has wrought into a story of sufficient interest, though he has not quite surmounted (he has tried it in the case of Saint-Just) the difficulty which has foiled every novelist we can think of in fashioning a live character out of a man of the Revolution. The translation is not elegant, but it may be read.

Money. By Émile Zola. Translated by Ernest A. Vizetelly. (Chatto & Windus.)—In some respects Mr. Ernest Vizetelly must have had comparatively little trouble with 'L'Argent.' He has duly cut out certain passages relating to the finding of Victor, Saccard's son by Rosalie Chavaille, and certain others relating to the financier and the Baroness Sandorff; and we do not remember anything else in particular that there was to cut. As for the translation, the book must have offered at least one crux—the problem whether to leave the argot of the Bourse such as it was, or to adjust it to English Stock Exchange phrases, or to subject it to some process of paraphrase or omission. Mr. Vizetelly, however, has been saved from any great difficulty about this by his general principle of translation, which is to stick as close to the French idiom in all cases as is consistent with being intelligible to Englishmen. It is not, perhaps, the best system of translation; but it is not quite the worst, and in work like M. Zola's (the purely literary value of which is little or nothing, while its matter and idiomatic force are much) it is applicable more freely than elsewhere. It is perfectly true, as the translator observes in a preface of "purpose," that the lesson of 'L'Argent' is by no means one of little meaning to England; and it is also true that it is one of the most forcibly put of the whole series.

The Last Day of the Carnival. By J. Kostromitin. Translated from the Russian. (Fisher Unwin.)—This purports to be "the first of a series in which the author intends to give, in a literary form, an important account of present social and political life in Russia." His intentions may be excellent, but the form of this, the first of the series, is anything but literary, and, though the "account" may be "important" to the author, it is also inaccurate and misleading. Apparently 'The Last Day of the Carnival' sees the light for the first time in its English dress, and has never been published in Russian—indeed, it is difficult to suppose that an austere Russian censor would ever have permitted it to receive his approval. Isolated incidents and scenes have a strangely familiar air, and remind us strongly of Gleb Ouspenski and Stechodrin. The book is a Rabelaisian satire, delectable reading, despite its barbarous "literary form," to those who are well acquainted with Russia; but it is no more an accurate picture of Russian life than Mark Twain's "account" of the Knights of the Round Table is a faithful reproduction of Arthurian chivalry. In Russia, where the press labours under capricious restrictions, reading between the lines has become an art. Curious works are produced, apparently without sense or continuity, and the public devour them eagerly, gloating over the sly satire of the powers that be which lies concealed in a mass of incoherent absurdities; but it is too much to expect that the unophisticated British public should be able to put the dots on the i's and understand the obscure allusions in disguised political pamphlets. Yet such a disguised political pamphlet is the work under consideration. It purports to relate the history of a day in a Russian provincial town. The dramatic personæ are grotesque caricatures, the incidents have the wild improbability of Lover's novels without their humour or their decency, the jokes have the coarseness of Swift without his wit, and the result is loathsome. Unless the reader possesses a previous knowledge of Russia he will miss the points and be nauseated. The story, if story it be, is briefly this. A successful barrister marries the only daughter of a wealthy publican; the publican disowns her. The girl loves a drunken, penniless officer, who marries a rich but ancient widow. The domestic relations of the heroine are intolerable; she runs away from her husband, and seeks refuge under her father's roof. The husband smashes the windows of the public-house, forces his way in, and is ejected. But so is his wife, who flies to the house of a fortune-teller and receiver of stolen goods, who is in league with the police. Finally the husband recovers her at a masquerade, and the book is brought to its dreary end. The story pursues its course through orgies and riotings that are sickening, and the only approximately decent person is the hero's brother, a Nihilist who has escaped from Siberia, and turns up most inopportunistly in the midst of these Gargantuan junketings. What does all this mean? Is it supposed to be an "important account" of Russian social life? It is merely a satire intended to show that in the land of the Tsar might is right, that the rouble is the real autocrat, and that topsy-turvydom reigns supreme. Everybody gets drunk, everybody is on the verge of ruin; robbery, cruelty, brutality are universal, honesty and virtue impossible. The only successful people are unscrupulous lawyers, who openly and cynically defy the laws alike of their country and of common decency. The object of such a book, of course, is to show that such a state of society cannot endure and must not be tolerated, and that while it exists "man, being reasonable, must needs get drunk." True as this may be from a controversial point of view, it is, of course, absurd when taken literally and applied descriptively. As has been already said, the book lacks originality; newspaper reports and reminiscences of Gleb Ouspenski and Stechodrin are jumbled together. The translator has added notes here and there, which are printed in the body of the work, and contribute towards the general confusion of ideas which will be the inevitable result to the candid reader.

The Prose Tales of Alexander Pushkin. Translated from the Russian by T. Keane. (Bell & Sons.)—This is a very able and very readable translation of some of the principal prose tales of the father of modern Russian literature; there seems, however, very little reason for its publication, coming as it does so soon after the admirable collection translated by Mrs. Sutherland Edwards. 'The Captain's Daughter' has been presented to the public in an English dress several times, notably by Capt. Godfrey, whose translation is the most faithful and scholarly of any. We are grateful for 'Dobrovsky,' which, so far as we are aware, is unknown to English readers. It is certainly a most powerful romantic story, in which the influence of Schiller's 'Robbers' is traceable. With the exception of these two stories, the collection published by Mrs. Sutherland Edwards is more complete than that of Mr. Keane. Pushkin's stories are nevertheless so charming and so suitable for translation that we are glad to welcome the present careful and very literary version.

MR. UNWIN has published in a handsome shape, under the title of Piers Plouman: a Contribution to the History of English Mysticism, a translation of M. Janssens' valuable work 'L'Epopée Mystique de William Langland,' which we reviewed some eight months ago.—A work of modern mysticism, The Kingdom of God is within You, by Count L. Tolstoy, has been excellently translated into English by Mrs. E. Garnett, and published in two volumes by Mr. Heinemann.—An abridged translation of 'L'Arte di prender Moglie' of Prof. P. Mantegazza has been issued in one neat volume by Messrs. Gay & Bird, under the title of The Art of taking a Wife.

THE LITERATURE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Adversaria Critica Sacra. With a Short Explanatory Introduction by Frederick H. A. Scrivener, M.A., D.C.L., LL.D. (Cambridge, University Press.)—These 'Adversaria Critica Sacra' consist of collations of forty-nine MSS. of portions of the New Testament, six MSS. containing fragments of the Septuagint, and a record of the variations from the textus receptus of the principal early editions of the New Testament. A minute and accurate account is given of each MS. It is needless to say that Dr. Scrivener did his work with the utmost conscientiousness, and that his labours are of great value, and deserve the heartiest recognition from all Biblical scholars. He made no effort to determine how far his new collations will modify the text of the New Testament, but throughout the book there runs a current of opposition to the principles laid down by Hort in his 'Introduction to the New Testament in the Original Greek,' edited by him and Bishop Westcott. It begins in a note on p. vi of the Introduction, in which Dr. Scrivener states that Dean Burgon

"had been engaged day and night for years in making a complete index or view of the manuscripts used by the Nicene (and ante-Nicene) Fathers, by way of showing that they were not identical with those copied in the Sinaitic and Vatican codices, and, inasmuch as they were older, they must needs be purer and more authentic than these overvalued uncials."

In a postscript to the Introduction Dr. Scrivener says that Dean Burgon

"very earnestly requested me that if I lived to complete the present work, I would publicly testify that my latest labours had in no wise modified my previous critical convictions, namely, that the true text of the New Testament can best and most safely be gathered from a comprehensive acquaintance with every source of information yet open to us, whether they be Manuscripts of the original text, Versions, or Fathers, rather than from a partial representation of three or four authorities which, though in date the more ancient and akin in character, cannot be made even tolerably to agree together."

Dr. Scrivener renews his avowal, and illustrates it by an instance. The opinion comes out most strongly in the words of Mr. Hoskier, who collated Evan. 604 for Dr. Scrivener. Dr. Scrivener says:—

"Mr. Hoskier's conclusion shall be given in his own words: 'I defy any one, after having carefully perused the foregoing lists, and after having noted the almost incomprehensible combinations and permutations of both the uncial and cursive manuscripts, to go back again to the teaching of Dr. Hort with any degree of confidence. How useless and superfluous to talk of Evan. 604 having a large western element, or of its siding in many places with the neutral text. The whole question of families and recensions is thus brought prominently before the eye, and with space we could largely comment upon the deeply interesting combinations which thus present themselves to the critic. But do let us realize that we are in the infancy of this part of the science.....and not imagine that we have successfully laid certain immutable foundation stones, and can safely continue to build thereon. It is not so: much, if not all, of these foundations must be demolished.....It has cost me a vast amount of labour and trouble to prepare this statement of evidence with any degree of accuracy; but I am sure it is worth while, and I trust that it may stimulate others to come to our aid, and also help to annul much of Dr. Hort's erroneous theories.'"

This work has a mournful interest, as it was the last that was prepared and edited by the great Biblical critic.

A First Introduction to the Greek Testament, with Extracts from the Gospels and Epistles. Accompanied by Notes, Grammatical and Explanatory. By Theophilus D. Hall. (Murray.)—This volume is specially designed for the use of those "who, not having acquired a knowledge of Greek in earlier years, are now deterred from the pursuit by the acknowledged difficulties of the subject." Many attempts have been made previously to meet the demands of this class, but Mr. Hall has certainly succeeded better than most of his predecessors. He has devoted great attention to the exact nature of the Greek which is found in the New Testament, and especially to the points in which it differs from classical Greek. He has in consequence been able to omit from the grammatical portion of his work many words and forms which occur in every grammar of classical Greek, and thus the student is relieved of many difficulties which would have unnecessarily obstructed his path. The work is, moreover, a model of clearness, and the arrangement of the grammatical matter is admirable. Still, we doubt whether a person who has not learnt Latin or Greek in his early days would make much of the grammar. We suspect that he would need a teacher to explain the technical terms, and to furnish him with the ideas on which every grammar of a synthetic language is based. We are not sure also whether Mr. Hall has not committed a mistake in trying to combine instruction in the language with criticism of the literature of the New Testament. His book is divided into three parts. The first is on "The Language, Manuscripts, Editions" of the New Testament. The information is accurate, concise, and attractive. But it supposes that the reader already knows something of Greek, and takes an interest in critical studies. The second part consists of the concise grammar which we have already noticed. The third part is composed of "extracts from the New Testament, presenting a connected view of the life of our Saviour from the commencement of his public ministry; chiefly from the Gospel of St. Mark," and of a few extracts from the epistles on Christian ethics and service. The selection is judicious. The extracts are suitable for beginners in Greek, and they are of the greatest value from a religious and moral point of view. Mr. Hall has performed a double function in regard to them. He has acted as an expounder of the language for beginners, and as a commentator on the subject-matter. He has performed both functions well, but we doubt whether it was wise to mingle the results in the same notes. Yet the book certainly deserves great praise, and will be of most use to those who, having learnt a little Latin or Greek in former days, wish now, from their interest in the contents of the Scriptures, to master the Greek Testament. It forms a serviceable introduction for such, both to the language and the criticism. On the whole the volume is accurate, but it needs revision. Thus on p. 28 the neuter of the present and perfect participle active of λέω is set down, with a note stating that it "is here given for the sake of the form; it could scarcely occur in actual use." But no explanation of this is vouchsafed, and the reader is led to infer that the neuters of present and perfect participles active are not likely to occur. And he will therefore be astonished to find when he comes to read his first lesson that a present participle in the neuter occurs in it, and that, as he goes on, perfect and aorist participles in the neuter occasionally make their appearance. There are also a few mistakes in the accents. ἐκρίψ is once correctly accented in small type, but the accent is on the penult several times when the word is printed in large type.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

It would seem that year by year fishing and shooting, whether big game or small game, are becoming more and more restricted to those sportsmen whose purses are deep and well filled. We learn in Five Months' Sport in Somali Land, by Lord Wolverton (Chapman & Hall), that the camp, or cafula, as he prefers to term it, consisted of eighty-eight men, sixty-six camels, a herd of sheep and oxen, seven donkeys, and eight ponies; and for all these water had to be carried over one hundred miles of desert. This must have meant considerable expense, and the return in the form of sport seems most inadequate. The lions, as usual, appear to have fallen far short of our notions of the king of beasts, and the mode of shooting them seems calculated to prevent the display of such courage as they may possess. Again, the country must be singularly uninviting and unhealthy if we may judge from the fact that 2,000 pills of three grains of quinine each proved to be inadequate, and that a further supply was required before the party returned to the coast. The book can hardly be treated seriously, for it has apparently been written with scant care; as, for example, when we are told of the bleaching bones of a villager "who, having been delayed, had returned homewards after sundown, and been killed and eaten the previous day by a lion." And, again, it would seem that the goats of the equatorial district have strange appetites, for that tract of land "must, we think, entirely depend, first, on its goats, which make very good skins; secondly, on its herds, which will in the future supply them with food," and so on. Yet the writer can do better if he chooses to take pains; and that he possesses both imagination and power of description is clear from the story of the mother and child left to die in the desert. The binding, type, and paper are all good; but the book—which, after all, has only 108 pages—has no contents, chapters, page headings, nor index. It is illustrated from photographs by Col. Paget, and there is a clear map, on which certain routes are laid down; but it is not possible, either from it or from the context, to say how much is due to "Mr. Vine, our cartographer."

South Sea Yarns. By Basil Thomson. With Illustrations. (Blackwood & Sons.)—These "yarns" are of exceptional value from more than one point of view. The writer is thoroughly conversant with the surroundings, remote and unfamiliar to most of us, amid which his scenes are laid; from humanity and imagination he feels strongly for the natives, though by no means—to use an expression of Lord Pembroke's—"South-Sea-islandized." The dedication of his book "To my Wife" may, indeed, be taken as a guarantee that it is sound family reading. And lastly, while interested in Fijian affairs, he has not lost the sense of the proportion which these bear to the affairs of Europe, though he admits that to retain this sense it is necessary to spend at least one month out of every five at a distance from those fascinating islands. Possibly a good deal of the romance which we associate with South Sea island life is the product of our own imaginations. At all events, the chivalrous sentiment is in the Fijian, as regards what many will consider the most important sphere, absolutely non-existent. His history abounds in acts of splendid devotion to his chiefs; towards women the sentiment is practically unknown. Thus in one of these stories a Fijian sailor dwells on the devotion of his British skipper to a dying and not even beautiful wife as not only foolish, but quite unseemly. On the other hand, these yarns give instances of great devotion on the part of the native women, often indeed—but this is not specially Fijian—to very unworthy objects, as the drunken European trader. But here again a limitation comes in. They can feel deeply, and are even capable of tragic endings to their despair; but their character is none the less, according to Mr. Thomson, essentially that of a child, and their emotions accordingly, however keen, proportionally short-lived. Certainly this is the impression, more or less definite, which the race makes, men and women alike, on those who have dealings with it. It is almost superfluous to say that these stories give curious glimpses into native life and into native thought, both the genuine and the sometimes rather confused product of missionary teaching; and we have besides some stirring reminiscences of the old fighting days. If Mr. Thomson should ever contemplate a second series of yarns, he might well collect a few of the old Fijian sagas (from one of which he quotes in the present work), for it is understood that they exist in considerable numbers, and the generation which could repeat, or indeed interpret, them is rapidly passing away.

CAPT. EARDLEY-WILMOT, R.N., has arranged and edited Lord Brassey's Papers and Addresses, which are published by Messrs. Longman & Co. in two volumes, almost the whole of them dealing with naval topics. They will be found of value to all who are interested in such questions; but some of them are a little out of date.

Messrs. SONNENSCHEIN & Co. publish The English Democracy: its Promises and Perils, by Mr. Arnold White, a volume in which we are told many things which most of us know already. Mr. Arnold White is persuaded that the House of Commons has deteriorated; yet he is, we understand, anxious to become a member of that body. When he does so he will probably agree in the estimate which has been formed by Mr. Gladstone and others of its oldest and most illustrious members—that the contrary is the case, and that there probably never was a moment in our history when the House of Commons contained so much ability (especially among the younger men) and so much devotion to the public welfare.

Mr. R. H. DAVIS, doubtless an American, publishes, through Messrs. Sampson Low, Our English Cousins, a bright and pleasant little illustrated volume. Mr. Davis has been to the Derby, he has visited the universities and Henley, gone through a general election, been in London in the season, and visited the East-End. He is decidedly intelligent; but his observation is here and there a little of the "slipshod" order. He is under the impression, for example, that the Corrupt Practices Act has destroyed bribery, and he seems to imagine that the corruption of the smaller constituencies is a thing of the past. We fancy that there are those who could take him to boroughs where the practices of former days are not unknown. In order to prove how like a club the House of Commons is, he introduces "red-waistcoated waiters," who are, we believe, not to be detected in the precincts of that assembly. One of the oddest of his assumptions is that the presence in the gallery of the Prince of Wales might conceivably have some bearing upon whether members should or should not sit hatted. That question, history teaches us, was settled in the time of the Stuarts, by the discussions which followed the presence, not of the Prince of Wales, but of the king.

THE LATH BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS.

Huddersfield, June 11, 1894.

THE obituary notices that have appeared this week of the late Lord A. C. Hervey omit any reference to one of the most important events in the good bishop's life, namely, his discovery of W. Tyndale's translation of Jonah.

A tradition existed that Tyndale had translated into English and published the book of Jonah, but no copy of it was known to be in any English or foreign public library, nor in the hands of any private collector. Within a few years of Tyndale's death all trace of this work appears to have been lost; even John Rogers, Tyndale's intimate friend and literary executor, overlooked it, for when he gathered together the various portions of the Bible which had been translated by Tyndale, and published them in 1537 as "Matthew's" Bible, now commonly called Tyndale's Bible, he did not insert Tyndale's translation of Jonah, but substituted Coverdale's rendering of 1535.

After 324 years had passed away, and no copy of Tyndale's Jonah had turned up, its ever having existed was regarded as a myth by sceptical people; but traditions have a curious habit of in time showing themselves to be true. So it proved in this case, for one day the late bishop was fortunate enough to discover in his library a genuine copy which at some time had been bound up with a number of miscellaneous ancient pamphlets, and so had hitherto escaped recognition. It consists of twenty-four leaves, and bears internal evidence that it was printed by Martin de Keyser at Antwerp. There are twenty-six lines on a full page of the prologue; the printed matter measures 3 in. by 4½ in. The translation varies much from that of Coverdale.

J. R. DOBE.

AN UNKNOWN BALADE BY CHAUCER.

June 11, 1894.

I THINK that in justice to my friend Mr. Warner, of the Department of MSS., I ought to state that he duly noted the existence of the Balade about which Dr. Skeat writes to you, at the time that the acquisition of the MS. for the British Museum was considered, and that he soon afterwards communicated it to me with a view to its publication. That it has not reached you sooner is, therefore, my fault, or, if I may plead an excuse, that of the heavy amount of correspondence I have had the last few months in connexion with the Bibliographical Society, which has made every additional letter seem an evil to be postponed at any cost. If I had shared Dr. Skeat's high opinion of the little poem, I should not have been so sluggish; but it seemed to me, and to some Chaucer friends to whom I showed it, that except at the beginning and end it has little of the poet's happiness of touch. The uses of ful in the lines:—

That while I live myn hert to his maystresse Yow hath ful chose in triew perversaunce, and of too in:—

Considrynge eke how I bange in balance
In yowre service; such, lou, is my chaunce
Abidyng grace, &c.

appear to me difficult to defend, except by an acknowledgment that they were wanted as stopgaps; while in the first of the lines quoted the necessity for slurring the final e which must be added to hert, and about the full pronunciation of which Chaucer is exceptionally careful, raises a difficulty of another kind. That Stow, to whom the MS. belonged, did not print the Balade, at first sight detracted a little from its claims; but Dr. Skeat's explanation, that he was probably daunted by its faults of transcription, is a very probable one. I have not, therefore, pointed out what seem to me the shortcomings of the poem (even after its careful editing) with any serious desire to contest the correctness of its ascription, but rather in humble protest against Dr. Skeat's pledging his high authority to the statement that the Balade (written, by the way, with the easiest rhymes in Middle English, auonce and ease) "is the most complete example that exists of his [Chaucer's] mastery over the technicalities of rhythm," a statement which is surely an injustice to the poet for whose honour Dr. Skeat has done so much.

In connexion with the main reason for my letter, I should, perhaps, mention that the Balade is entered in the new volume of the 'Catalogue of Additional Manuscripts,' which is already in print, and will shortly appear.

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "LAD" AND "LASS."

As the derivations commonly assigned to these words are notoriously impossible, I venture to offer the following conjectures, which I believe have at least the recommendation of not being in conflict with recognized phonological laws.

The word ladde in English earlier than the fifteenth century does not mean a boy or young man, but a servant or a man of humble rank. Thus in 'Piers Plowman' we have "to make lordes of laddes"; in 'Ferumbra,' "Flee þou schalt of þis lond, as a ladde dop, on þy fote"; in Robert of Brunne, "A ladde (bucder, Wace) was y þys lond of fame, Karaucyus þon was his name.....Borne he was of pouere lynage"; in 'Havelok,' "þe chaunpions, and ek the ladden" (where the weak plural is noteworthy). It is commonly supposed that this sense is developed from that of "boy," as in the case of the words knave and waiter. But as the sense "boy" is nowhere distinctly evident in the early examples, it seems more reasonable to suppose that the word originally meant "servant." A parallel development may be found in the German dime, the etymological sense of which is "female slave." The word ladde coincides with the adjectival form of the past participle of the verb to lead. It seems not impossible that this may be the real origin of the word; a "ladde," in the older sense, being one of those led in the train of a lord or commander. We may compare the Italian condotto, explained by Tommaseo as "soldato di banda, mercenario."

The feminine lass first occurs about the year 1300 in two Northern works, the 'Metrical Homilies' and the 'Cursor Mundi,' and in both passages is spelt lasse. This spelling suggests that the word is one of those in which Northern dialects represent a Scandinavian ak by as, as in as for ashes (Scandinavian aska), Scotch buss for bush (Scandinavian busk). Hence the etymology of the word may be sought in the Scandinavian lasku, the feminine of an adjective meaning unmarried; cf. Middle Swedish lask kona, unmarried woman (Söderwall's dictionary). The original sense of the adjective (which is etymologically akin to the verb to let) is "free from ties, loose," whence the meaning "vagrant," also found in Middle Swedish, and the Icelandic sense (see Vigfusson, under laskr) "idle, weak." The association of the words lad and lass is, if this explanation be correct, due to their accidental similarity in sound.

HENRY BRADLEY.

SALIES.

At the sale by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson the following prices were realized for books and MSS. from the library of Mr. O. Conway Thornton, between the 6th and the 13th of June:

Heures a l'usage de Paris, on vellum, with miniatures, 1515, 11l. 11s. Lamb's Elia, boards, uncut, 1823, 4l. 4s. Lander's Gebir, with two MS. poems, 5l. 5s. Keats's Lamia, first edition, 7l. 10s. Lady Jackson's Works, 14 vols., 11l. Briefe Relation of the Discovery of New England, 7l. 5s. Scrope's Deer Stalking and Salmon Fishing, 9l. 15s. Early Ipswich Printing, 1548, 8l. Horse Intemperate, printed on vellum, with miniatures, 1515, 10l. The total of the sale was 1,600l.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge have sold the following books from the library of the late Mr. Frederick Burgess: Boaden, Memoirs of Mrs. Siddons, extra illustrated, 12l. 10s. The Humourist, 4 vols., 1819, 14l. 15s. Dickens, Sketches by Box, 1839, demy 8vo. 19l.; Pickwick Papers, in the original numbers, 1837, 34l. (this copy cost Mr. Burgess 29l.); The Strange Gentleman, 1837, 38l. (bought by Mr. Burgess for 22l.); Life of Kean, 3 vols., with extra illustrations, 21l. Lamb, Essays of Elia, both series, 1823-33, 13l. 5s. Thackeray, Dionysius Diddler, 9 plates and preface, 25l. 10s.; Flore et Zephyr, 1836, in morocco, 90l. A Scrap-Book containing portraits and autograph letters of actors, 56l.

The same auctioneers have sold the following books belonging to the late Mr. W. Parker Hamond, of Farnstead Hall, on June 5th: Crowe and Cavalcaselle, History of Painting, Vols. I., II., and III., 12l. 5s. Dibdin, Bibliographical Decameron and Tour in France and Germany, 22l. D'Avennes, L'Art Arabe, 4 vols., 1877, 17l. 5s. Gardiner, History of England, 8 vols., 18l. 15s. Pennant, London, with extra illustrations, 1805, 18l. 5s.

The same auctioneers sold the following books from the library of the late Sir Charles Eastlake, P.R.A., on June 8th: Nagler, Neues Allgemeines Künstler Lexicon, 1836, 18l. 10s. Crowe and Cavalcaselle, History of Painting in Italy and North Italy, 5 vols., 10l. Speculum Humane Salvationis (Gunther Zainer, Augsburg, circa 1471), 30l. 10s. Voragine, Legenda Sanctorum (damaged), 1473, 10l. 10s. Stirling Maxwell, Don John of Austria, 2 vols. large paper, 1883, 10l. 10s.

'ENGLISH BARDS AND SCOTCH REVIEWERS.'

June 9, 1894.

I HAVE to thank Mr. Murray for his obliging verification of the readings given by the Athenæum writer of 1891, who is shown to have erred in the transcription of all three lines. He is guiltless, however, of the statement that the first note respecting the duel was struck out of the fifth edition. He correctly describes the second note, dated "Nov. 11, 1811," as "additional."

Third Edition (spurious).—Mr. Bagguley's and Mr. Shelley's notes show that I was wrong in supposing "all editions" to read (p. 76, l. 5):

But where fair lass rolls her purer wave—

("when" in my note was a misprint for "where," due to my careless reading of the proof). It would be interesting to know whether these correspondents' copies agree in every particular; but though mine has none of the errors (except that in line 47) noted by Mr. Shelley in his, it would be rash to conclude from such minute variations that the copies belong to different issues, for in those days of the hand-press errors were often discovered and corrected while the printing was going on. In my copy I find "sung" misprinted for song (l. 107), "Printer's" for Printers' (l. 120), and "person" for personage (prose foot-note, l. 3). I observe also many errors in punctuation in the text, and the head-line to p. 2 wants its comma. We have still to lay hands on a genuine third. It ought to prove to be an exact reprint of the second, for Byron was abroad when it was published, and could have made no alterations.

Fourth Edition (1810).—I do not think I was wrong in saying that this was "a reprint of the third, which was a mere reprint of the second"; at all events, so far, no differences, except those resulting from presumably unintentional misprints, have been pointed out. Both my copies want an asterisk (*) to "Fitzgerald" in the first line; Postscript is misprinted "Postscript" at p. 83; and the punctuation throughout is very bad. There can now be little if any doubt that all copies dated 1810, and containing only 1,060 lines, are spurious. J. D. C.

The Homestead, Lathom, Ormskirk.

MR. MURRAY says: "I have Byron's MS. of the first 96 lines, which were prefixed—according to a pencil note in my grandfather's handwriting—to the third edition." These lines must surely be—less one—the 96 lines prefixed to the second edition, which J. D. C. dates "[October] 1809," so it would be interesting to know if Mr. Murray's MS. is dated.

In my copy of the second edition, l. 1007, p. 80, I find the misprint "Abodeen" to which J. D. C. draws attention, and which I had overlooked in my collation. JAMES BROMLEY.

MRS. GLASSE'S COOKERY BOOK.

Upton Rectory, Didcot.

SINCE my former communications upon this subject, I have met with two interesting copies of the book. One has been lent to me by Prebendary Bothamley, of Bath. It is a copy of the fourth edition in octavo, 1751. It possesses the engraved advertisement "Hannah Glasse," &c., but there is a slight variation in the imprint:—"London: Printed for the Author, and sold at the Bluecoat-Boy near the Royal-Exchange; at Mrs. Ashburn's China-Shop," &c., thus reversing the order of the two names as given in my copy. Mr. Bothamley's copy, however, has an additional interest. Bound up with it is "Appendix to Mrs. Glasse's Cookery: Containing Many New and Useful Receipts in all Branches of the Art. Calculated for Universal Use. To which is added, A copious Index to this and all the Octavo Editions. London, Printed for the Author: and sold by A. Millar, in the Strand; and T. Trye, near Gray's-Inn Gate, Holborn. MDCCLVIII. [Price One Shilling.]" The signature "H. Glasse" in this Appendix is in facsimile. The Appendix consists of forty-eight pages, and the index of twenty-four pages. The pagination commences with p. 1. The volume was evidently bound in 1758, and is lettered "Glasse's Cookery."

I need hardly say the volume has interested me very much. It is the first and only copy of the Appendix in a separate form, and with Mrs. Glasse's name on the title, that I have hitherto met with; and there are three things to which I would call the attention of the reader. It is styled "Mrs. Glasse's Cookery" in the title. It is lettered "Glasse's Cookery." It bears on the title the name of one of the most famous publishers of last century. Andrew Millar was the publisher of Thomson's 'Seasons'; of all Fielding's works (in fact they are advertised at the end of the index of this volume); was the principal agent in the publication of Johnson's dictionary, and collected and published the 'Rambler' and 'Adventurer.' The reader will remember the anecdote of Johnson's sending the last sheet of the dictionary to Millar. Millar retired from business in 1767, having acquired a large fortune by his integrity and liberality. Johnson said of him, "I respect Millar, sir; he has raised the price of literature." Would such a man connive at a literary imposture, and put Mrs. Glasse's name to a book written by such a charlatan as Sir John Hill?

The second copy before me is one of the sixth edition of 'The Art of Cookery.' This I have acquired since I wrote to the Athenæum. The title is the same as in all the previous editions, with this addition: "To which are added by way of Appendix, One hundred and fifty New and Useful Receipts, And a copious Index to this and all the Octavo Editions. Never before published. The Sixth Edition, with very large Additions." The imprint is the same as in the Appendix noticed above, being sold by A. Millar and T. Trye, 1758. The price is mentioned as five shillings. Mrs. Glasse's signature is in facsimile. The contents of the Appendix are added to the contents of the book. The body of the book consists of 330 pp.; then there are 4 pp. of "Additions as printed in the Fifth Edition"; then a leaf (or 2 pp.) on terms of the art of carving (e.g. "To rear a Goose," "to unbrace a Mallard," "to unlace a Coney," "to ally a Pheasant," &c.); and then follows the Appendix with index, making a volume of 408 pp. I may remark on this volume that Mrs. Glasse's name is not on the title, but it has simply "By a Lady"; and that the Appendix is printed consecutively from p. 336 to the end. The date 1758 is the same as that of the title-page of Probendary Bothamley's Appendix. When the fifth edition of the book was published I cannot say. These early editions are so rare that it is very difficult to find them.

Your correspondent Miss Jennett Humphreys may be pleased to hear that Mrs. Glasse's receipts in Jewish cookery first appeared in the Appendix of 1758. RICHARD HOOPER.

Literary Gossip.

THE forthcoming volume of the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' to be published on June 26th, extends from Morehead to Myles. Prof. J. K. Laughton writes on Sir Henry Morgan, the buccaneer; Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole on Sir Robert B. D. Morier, the diplomatist; Mr. Leslie Stephen on J. A. Cotto Morison; Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse on George Morland and Mulready; Mr. James Gairdner on Prof. Henry Morley; Prof. T. F. Tout on Roger Mortimer, first Earl of March, and many members of his family; Mr. W. A. J. Archbold on Cardinal Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury; Canon Venables on Bishop Thomas Morton; Mr. Joseph Knight on Munden, the actor, and Arthur Murphy, the dramatist; Mr. Sidney Lee on Edward Moxon, the publisher; Mr. B. B. Woodward on Henry Nottidge Moseley, the naturalist; Mr. Thomas Bayne on William Motherwell, the poet; Mr. G. A. Aitken on Peter Anthony Motteux; Mr. James Tait on Thomas Mowbray, first Duke of Norfolk, and on other members of the family; Dr. Greenhill on Prof. J. B. Mozley; the Rev. Alexander Gordon on Lodowick Muggleton; the Rev. J. H. Lupton on Richard Mulcaster; Mr. A. L. Hardy on Thomas Mun, the economist; Mr. J. D. Duff on H. A. J. Munro, editor of Lucretius; Sir Alexander Arbuthnot on Sir Thomas Munro; Dr. J. F. Payne on Charles Murchison; Prof. Bonney on Sir Roderick Murchison; Mr. R. B. Prosser on William Murdoch, the inventor of gas-lighting; Dr. Richard Garnett on John Murray "the second," the publisher; Mr. Thomas Seccombe on the latter's son, John Murray "the third"; Miss Fell Smith on Lindley Murray; Mr. J. M. Rigg on William Murray, Earl of Mansfield, the judge; and Mr. Gordon Goodwin on Sir Hugh Myddelton.

THE Countess of Jersey has entered the lists of authorship with a story-book for children called 'The Red Jar,' which is to be published by Messrs. Macmillan with illustrations for the next Christmas season.

MRS. H. G. WOODS, after finishing a longer work of fiction, is understood to be engaged in writing some short stories.

MR. FRASER RAE, who is engaged upon a 'Life of Sheridan,' writes:—

"I should like to know whether collectors of manuscripts have in their possession any of the letters which Mrs. Sheridan wrote to her sister, Mrs. Tickell, during the years between 1780 and 1786, and, if they are extant, I should further desire to see them. Many letters from Mrs. Tickell to her sister have been preserved, and they are now in my temporary custody. I have been in communication with several of Mrs. Tickell's descendants, but none of them has any knowledge of these letters. They may have passed out of Mr. Tickell's hands after his first wife's death, and may now be in a private collection."

THE will of the late Prof. Robertson Smith has just been proved. By it he leaves his Arabic and Syriac manuscript books, together with twenty early printed or scarce books to be selected by the Librarian, to the University Library. With this exception, the whole of his working library, which is very valuable, is left to Christ's College. A preliminary meeting has been held, at which it was agreed that there should be a memorial at Cambridge of the late professor, and it was suggested that this might be done by raising a fund for the maintenance and extension of his library at Christ's College for the benefit of all Oriental students—an object which he was known to have much at heart—and for the purchase of further manuscripts for the University Library. It being now too late to take further steps this term, a meeting will be held at Cambridge early in October.

A GENERAL meeting of the donors of the Seaside Home for Booksellers, and a meeting of the Committee, both well attended, have been held during the week, Mr. C. J. Longman taking the chair on each occasion. Additional subscriptions have been received, making the total amount to hand about 850*l*. Rules have been framed, which will shortly be in the hands of the members, and arrangements are being entered into to take possession of No. 49, Royal Parade, Eastbourne, by the 24th of this month. It is, therefore, hoped that the Seaside Home will be ready for the reception of holiday-making booksellers, their assistants and their families, on and after July 1st next. Applications for rooms must be made on forms to be obtained of the Secretary at 48, Paternoster Row.

A NEW edition of the Catalogue of the Reform Club Library is nearly ready. It is eleven years since the last appeared, and, though printed for the members, a desire for copies was manifested by the public, which will be met by Messrs. Smith & Elder undertaking the publication of the present edition. An introduction, on 'The Reform Club and its Library,' contains an account of the foundation of the club and the formation of the library on a plan drawn up by the late Sir Anthony Panizzi, as well as personal and bibliographical details concerning the past and present members of the Library Committee, a body which is elected by the club and is independent of the General Committee.

THE autograph manuscript of Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' was sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge on Wednesday for 300*l*.; and a volume containing portions of 'Waverley' and 'Ivanhoe,' and other fragments, realized 215*l*.

MR. WHIBLEY's edition of 'The Ethiopians' of Heliodorus, in Mr. Henley's "Tudor Translation Series," is nearly ready. It will be followed by Mabbes's translation of the 'Celestina.'

MR. HENLEY is going to edit a new series of English classics for Messrs. Methuen.

THE Huguenot Society proposes to pay a visit to Dublin in July.

WITH reference to the paragraph in our last week's issue concerning the price paid for the serial rights of 'Lord Ormont and his Aminta,' we hear that Mr. Stevenson asks 25*l*. a thousand words for the serial rights of 'St. Ives.' We have received letters telling us of prices of 14*l*. and 15*l*. a thousand words for short stories, but they are hardly to the point.

ANOTHER special copy (the twelve volumes being bound in twenty-four) of the Abbotsford edition of the Waverley Novels has just been sold by auction by a Manchester firm. Although in this expanded form the value is enhanced, it realized only the modest sum of 6*l*. 15*s*. An exceptionally low price has just been realized by the sale at a provincial auction-room of a copy of the scarce book 'Memoirs of Grimaldi,' with introduction by Charles Dickens and illustrations by George Cruikshank. It was knocked down for 1*l*. 18*s*.

IN reference to the forgeries of documents professedly written by Burns, Scott, Tannahill, &c., which some time ago created a sensation in Edinburgh, the Scotsman says that an album has been prepared, for presentation to the Scottish Society of Antiquaries, giving facsimiles of the spurious manuscripts. It contains an inscription describing it as a record of the most extensive literary forgeries which have occurred in Scotland.

MESSRS. DENT & Co. have in active preparation a new edition of Madame de Staël's 'Corinne.' The edition of Sterne which Mr. Saintsbury is editing for the same firm, and which begins with 'Tristram Shandy,' will include also the 'Sentimental Journey,' and a selection of the letters and sermons.

IN connexion with the recent discussion upon 'An Unknown Charter of Liberties' in the English Historical Review, Dr. Liebermann has decided to publish very shortly in this country the text of Henry I.'s coronation charter, with 300 variants from 28 MSS., together with an introduction in English describing the origin and classification of the several MSS., and the text of a unique French version dated about 1200. The contents of this treatise will be communicated by Dr. Liebermann to the Royal Historical Society, of which he is a Corresponding Fellow, at its next meeting on the 21st inst.

WE are glad to hear that the resolution to abolish the newspaper stamp has passed the Austrian Chamber of Deputies.

THE late Bishop of Bath and Wells deserves to be chronicled in these columns as a sound scholar of an old-fashioned type.—Last week we forgot to mention the decease of Prof. Roscher, the well-known writer on political economy.—From America comes the news of the death of Prof. Whitney, the distinguished Sanskrit scholar.

A HARD-WORKING scholar has recently passed away in the person of Dr. Wilhelm Freund, who died at Breslau, at the ripe age of nearly eighty-nine. Dr. Freund, who was a pupil of Büchh, issued a number of books, and he made for himself a name chiefly by his Latin dictionaries, which used to be well known in this country, but have been superseded for some time. For a number of years he edited a Schulerbibliothek, which, consisting of exhaustive "cribs," formed the abomination of teachers and the delight of pupils. It was often regretted in Germany that a scholar of his standing should have been obliged to stoop to the manufacture of the lowest class of educational works. In 1852 Dr. Freund came over to this country to collect materials at the British Museum for a scientific work.

THE Turkish papers are publishing some statistics to illustrate the great progress of public instruction in Turkey under the present Sultan. Since his accession the increase in the number of schools is estimated at 25,000, said to be attended by a million and a quarter scholars of both sexes. It is difficult to ascertain what the number formerly was, but there is no doubt the increase is great. This is largely due to the measures taken by the late Sultans, Abd ul Mejid and Abd ul Aziz, in laying the foundation of a Ministry of Instruction, which of late years have been bearing fruit. The progress is also greatly due to the successful working of the reform of the administration of pious or ecclesiastical foundations. Thus, not only have numerous mosques and schools been founded, particularly in connexion with the large immigration of refugees, and religious fervour aroused, but the revenues of the local religious establishments have been considerably augmented. Formerly education in the country districts was very backward, particularly for girls, as parents did not value it; but since education has become compulsory the attendance has much improved. It is only of late that actual statistics have been collected on a satisfactory plan, but the means of comparison in the past are wanting and cannot be obtained.

THE Austrian critic and essayist, Dr. Oscar Wolten, died on May 29th at Mödling, near Vienna. His book 'Zola-Abende,' in which he critically analyzed all Zola's romances, had a great success, and the popularity of the master of French naturalism throughout Germany is largely attributed to it.

PROF. QUIDDE's pamphlet on 'Caligula,' whose sale was forbidden by the German authorities, on the ground that it suggested comparison between Caligula and the Kaiser, may now be bought and sold in Germany. It has been largely read in England, and we hear that a translation will shortly be published, with an introduction by a well-known journalist who has made German politics an object of special study.

SOME three years ago Herr Sigmund Brody, proprietor of the Neues Pester Journal, established—as we reported at the time—a triennial prize of 3,000 florins, to be awarded to the writer who had deserved best of his country by his journalistic activity. A few weeks ago, when the prize was allotted for the first time, the Hungarian Academy of Sciences adjudged it unanimously to the distinguished political writer Franz Pulasky. A more worthy choice could not have been made, since no man has done more by his writings than he to make the cause of Hungary and Louis Kossuth popular outside his native country.

DR. A. BERLINER's 'History of the Jews in Rome,' from the earliest times to the present day (2,050 years), in German, is now ready for publication.

MR. SAMUEL BUTLER has determined to publish his life of his grandfather, Bishop Butler, in two volumes, containing about as much matter as Stanley's 'Life of Arnold.' As we have already said, the book will throw much light upon the state of the public schools, especially Rugby and Shrewsbury, in the early years of the century. Dr. Butler's episcopal correspondence, which will be largely drawn upon, gives much information about ecclesiastical affairs at the beginning of the present reign.

MESSERS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE will soon publish the first volume of the English translation of Prof. Harnack's large work on the 'History of Dogma,' which we announced several months ago. The translator has had the benefit of the advance sheets of the third German edition. Prof. Harnack has written a new preface specially for this edition.

THE Parliamentary Papers of the most general interest to our readers this week are the Fourth Annual Report of the Astronomer Royal for Scotland (1d.); Education, England and Wales, Report on the Metropolitan Division, 1893 (2d.); and a Return showing the Persons employed in the Inspection of Secondary Schools in Scotland, with the Remuneration paid to Each, &c. Horns and Hoofs; or, Chapters on Hoofed Animals. By R. Lydekker. (Horace Cox.)
Zoology of the Invertebrata. By A. E. Shipley, M.A. (Black.)

ALTHOUGH the professed biologist sees signs that the interest in his subject is not so great as it was a few years ago, the publishers appear to be confident that popular works on natural history will bring them the solid reward which enterprise deserves. When we say "natural history" we are using the term in a more correct way than Mr. Lydekker, or the editors of previous works of a similar character, for we have in mind the fact that a publisher has lately begun the issue of a large popular work on botany. Mr. Lydekker intends to confine himself to a history of animals; what Dr. Sharpe's object is we do not know, but we have strong reason for thinking that by "naturalist" he means "zoologist"; at any rate, we are quite sure that the statement in his preface that the "object of the 'Naturalist's Library' is to give within a handy compass a scientific, and yet popular, account of the Australian mammals" gives a much too confined idea of Messrs. Allen's or his intentions. Mr. Hutchinson, also, takes a too limited view of what his title means, for he deals in the volume before us with vertebrate animals only.

If, however, there is no improvement in the titles of popular works, we are certainly seeing at present a marked advance in the matter, the manner, and the illustrations of popular works on zoology. Of the 'Royal Natural History' we must, of course, speak with reservation, for we have been handed only a brick of the proposed edifice; but we may say that if the other bricks are up to this sample we shall be well pleased to compliment Mr. Lydekker on his work as a zoological Master Builder.

Not content with his own serial publication, Mr. Lydekker has been the first to produce a volume of the reissue of the "Naturalist's Library." This work, of course, has so far been easy that he has had to hand an authoritative monograph on his subject in Mr. Oldfield Thomas's British Museum Catalogue of the existing members of these two groups, and of this he has, as he amply acknowledges, made full use. He has made parts of his own book readable by adding some general observations and various notes on habits, and he has made it a more complete presentation of the subject by referring to the principal fossil forms; he would, we think, have improved his book had he introduced the extinct forms in their proper zoological place, so nearly as that is known, instead of relegating them to the second part of the volume. We are always glad to see signs of a widely spread interest in zoological inquiries, but we were not prepared to find that a work in any sense meant to be popular would be undertaken by a publisher when found to contain the many technical details which the author has introduced, and, while praising the execution of the work, we cannot allow the reader to imagine that it is meant for perusal even by the severe members of the National Reading Union. When reviewing the 'History of Mammals,' which some three years since was produced by the author and Sir William Flower, we urged that the Monotremata should be more sharply separated from the rest of the Mammalia than these two distinguished specialists were then inclined to allow; we are glad to see that Mr. Lydekker has come round to our view. This encourages us to hope that he may take yet another suggestion, to which, indeed, we have before now called his attention in this journal. We are not going to find fault with the dog Latin or bad English in which many naturalists couch their technical diagnoses, for no one reads them but themselves. With popular works of merit it is otherwise; they do not always fall into the hands of those who know little Latin and less Greek, and it will not need much scholarship on the part of men of general education to make them wonder at the term "Monotremata" being used where Monotremata is obviously correct, and they will wonder at the editor passing the hybrid adjective "oo-viviparous" unless they have noted that he himself misuses the Whewellism (we will not call it the word) "scientist." On one important point only have we observed that Mr. Lydekker, in his endeavour to be "popular," has been incorrect:

Gegenbaur did not prove that the milk-glands of monotremes "correspond to the sweat-glands of [other mammals] and not to the milk-glands," but that the milk-glands of monotremes are formed on a different type from that of all other mammals.

We have not left ourselves much space to speak of the details of Mr. Hutchinson's brightly and intelligently written book, the body of which interested us so much that it was not till we asked ourselves how it was that it was so correct and so up to date that we turned to the preface, to find that many distinguished palæontologists have given him much assistance, and more than one has revised his proof-sheets. This does not detract at all from Mr. Hutchinson's merits, for the busy men who have helped him would never have been at the labour (and a labour it is) to revise another man's proofs had they not seen that they were giving a final touch to a well-conceived and well-executed plan. The author, we are sure, would wish that attention should be called to Mr. Smit's figures, representing his ideas as to the appearance of these creatures in those other days when they swam the waters, trod the land, or flew in the air.

The title of 'Horns and Hoofs' is a fair index to the style in which it is written; if we add that the articles of which it is made up were favourably received by the readers of the Field and of Land and Water, we shall probably convey a very fair idea of its scope and substance. We must own, however, that we are somewhat astonished at the large amount of technical zoology and zoological speculation which the modern sportsman will endure. When the subjects are brought before him as clearly as they are by Mr. Lydekker, we cannot suppose that he does not understand what he is reading about, and we must, therefore, express our satisfaction with one, at any rate, of the results of the attempt to popularize science. In a book of this kind Mr. Lydekker has several advantages: his knowledge of recent Ungulates is equalled, if not surpassed, by his acquaintance with the remains of their ancestors, and his discussion of certain problems of distribution and the like is, in consequence, intelligible and instructive. He has had, moreover, considerable acquaintance with many hoofed animals in their native haunts, and the work, therefore, is by no means that of a bookmaker. There are a number of woodcuts, some of which are excellent, but a few are by no means up to the average of the rest. The work is well printed, and we are inclined to think that a wife in search of a present for a sporting spouse might do worse than give him this book as a token of her admiration of his own sporting tales.

As the 'Zoology of the Invertebrata' is assuredly beyond the grasp of the "upper forms of schools," a part of the public for which the author designs it, and as it "is in no sense a work for advanced students," we conclude that it may be regarded as suitable for the "General" and the "First Part" of the Science Tripos at Cambridge; we hope it may prove useful to this somewhat limited public. Judged on the ordinary lines of a text-book, it is inadequate, even from the limited standpoint of pure morphology, although the author has evidently been at great pains to bring together widely dispersed observations and to select new and instructive figures rather than the usual text-book clichés. Unfortunately the figures are in many cases detestably reproduced, and the text is of a character which is best sought in the lecture room, consisting as it does of brief and somewhat dry descriptions of the Invertebrata, group by group.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

THE Rapport Annuel sur l'Etat de l'Observatoire de Paris has recently been presented to the Council by the new Director, M. Tisserand. He commences by a brief sketch of the great extension which has been given to the work of the observatory during the last few years, especially by the addition of the departments of spectroscopy and photography. All these have been continued in full activity and efficiency, whilst that of meridian observation still occupies the prominent position which it can never lose, for "c'est lui qui fournit en effet les constantes permettant de calculer les positions des planètes et des étoiles." That department has been under the immediate charge of M. Périgaud, and, owing doubtless in part to the favourable weather which prevailed, a large number both of stars (fundamental stars and supplementary stars of Lalande's 'Catalogue') and of planets was observed during 1893. Various changes have been made in the great équatorial coudé, under the superintendence of M. Léwy; the small instrument of the same construction has been employed by M. Puiseux in the observation of double stars, of comets, and of a few small planets. M. Bigourdan repaired to Senegal to observe the total eclipse of the sun which was visible there on the 16th of April, 1893. He was able to resume his work at Paris with the equatorial of the western tower on the 16th of the following month, and obtained a large number of observations of double stars, of nebulae, of comets, and casual phenomena; whilst M. Callendreau devoted himself principally to observing small planets and comets with the equatorial of the eastern tower. Celestial photography has been under the charge of M. Paul Henry; the portion of the photographic survey of the heavens undertaken at Paris has been vigorously continued, and lunar and other photographs have been also obtained. M. Deslandres has, as before, superintended the department of spectroscopy; he took part in the observation of the total eclipse of the sun in Senegal, and afterwards continued his work at Paris on the sun and stars. The meteorological observations, superintended by M. Wolf, have been regularly pursued by the same methods and with the same instruments as in preceding years. The reduction of all observations has been diligently kept up; the volumes for 1886 and 1887 will soon be issued, their printing being far advanced, and that for 1888 will shortly be commenced.

Prof. G. W. Hough, of the North-Western University and Director of the Dearborn Observatory, Evanston, Illinois, has published in Nos. 3233-4 of the Astronomische Nachrichten a new (third) catalogue of 187 double stars discovered with the 18½-inch refractor of that observatory during the years 1890-3, together with a valuable series of measures of 152 known pairs.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—June 7.—Right Hon. Lord Kelvin, President, in the chair.—The annual meeting for the election of Fellows was held.—The following were elected: Mr. W. Bateson, Mr. G. A. Boulenger, Dr. J. R. Bradford, Prof. H. L. Callendar, Prof. W. W. Cheyne, Mr. R. E. Froude, Prof. M. J. M. Hill, Prof. John Viriamu Jones, Mr. A. E. H. Love, Mr. R. Lydekker, Mr. F. C. Penrose, Mr. D. H. Scott, Rev. F. J. Smith, Mr. J. W. Swan, and Mr. V. H. Velez.—The following papers were read: 'On the Newtonian Constant of Gravitation,' by Prof. C. V. Boys; 'On the Recurrent Images attending Visual Impressions,' by Mr. E. Bidwell; 'Niagara Falls as a Chronometer of Geological Time,' by Dr. J. W. Spencer; 'Contributions to the Life-history of the Foraminifera,' by Mr. J. J. Lister; and 'The Influence of Intravenous Injection of Sugar on the Gases of the Blood,' by Dr. Vaughan Harley.

GEOLOGICAL.—June 6.—Dr. H. Woodward, President, in the chair.—Mr. F. L. Kitchin was elected a Fellow, and M. P. de Loriol-Lafort, of Geneva, a Foreign Correspondent of this Society.—The following communications were read: 'On the Banded Structure of some Tertiary Gabbros in the Isle of Skye,' by Sir A. Geikie and Mr. J. J. H. Teall; 'On the Microscopical Structure of the Derbyshire Carboniferous Dolerites and Tuffs,' by Mr. H. H.

Arnold-Bemrose, and 'On the Origin of the Permian Broccias of the Midlands, and a Comparison of them with the Upper Carboniferous Glacial Deposits of India and Australia,' by Mr. R. D. Oldham.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—June 6.—Mr. E. Green in the chair.—Dr. Hopkins read a paper 'On an Early Seventeenth Century Organ Contract.' The organ was built for the chapel of Chirk Castle, North Wales, by John Burward, organ maker of London, at a cost of 150*l*, paid by Sir Thomas Myddelton, the then owner of the castle. The date of the contract is February 29th, 1631, and the organ was completed in ten months. Dr. Hopkins exhibited the original contract, and also some contemporary M.S. music-books from the same chapel.—Dr. Wickham Legg read a paper 'On the Constitution Quia propter which governed Canonical Elections in the Middle Ages.' They were (1) by way of the Holy Ghost, (2) by scrutiny, and (3) by compromise. Instances of the survival of these practices in England in the nineteenth century were given.

LINNEAN.—June 7.—Mr. C. B. Clarke, President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. E. Bailey, F. W. Hildyard, and A. Ziets were elected Fellows.—The President nominated as vice-presidents for the year Messrs. J. G. Baker, W. Carruthers, and F. Crisp, and Prof. C. Stewart.—Dr. J. Lowe communicated the results of observations made by him in Madeira and Tenerife on the habit in certain insectivorous small birds, belonging to the genera Sylvia, Phylloscopus, and Parus (of which specimens were exhibited), of puncturing the calyxes of flowers for the purpose of attracting insects on which they feed.—An interesting discussion followed, in which the President, the Rev. G. Henslow, and others took part.—Mr. Carruthers exhibited a series of photographs of the celebrated Cowthorpe oak in Yorkshire, taken at long intervals, commencing with a reproduction of Dr. Hunter's engraving of 1776, and made remarks upon the rate of growth and decay, and probable duration of life in this tree.—Mr. R. Dowling exhibited and made remarks upon a dwarf glaucous pine, and some curiously shaped Trapa fruits from Japan.—Mr. T. Christy exhibited specimens of two species of Polystichum (P. sachalinense and P. cuspidatum), of value for forage, and pointed out that the roots of the mature plants when cut are, in the former species of a whitish colour, and in the latter of a bright yellow, enabling the two to be readily distinguished.—A paper was then read by Sir J. Lubbock 'On Stipules and the Protection of Buds.'—A discussion followed, in which the Rev. G. Henslow, Mr. A. W. Bennett, Prof. Marshall Ward, and Mr. J. Fraser took part.—Before the meeting adjourned the President announced that a bust of Charles Waterton, the Yorkshire naturalist, and author of 'Wanderings in South America,' had been presented to the Society by the trustees of the late Mrs. Pitt Rivers (sic Busk). This bust was executed in 1865 (the year in which Waterton died at the age of eighty-three) by the late Mr. W. Hawkins. It is an excellent likeness, and the only bust of him in existence. The only accessible portrait of him is a small engraving by Adlard, which forms a frontispiece to the third volume of the 'Essays on Natural History,' from an original oil painting by C. W. Peale, made in Philadelphia in 1824, when Waterton was in his forty-second year. A comparison of this portrait with the bust shows a remarkable correspondence, allowing for the forty years which elapsed between the two sittings.

ZOOLOGICAL.—June 5.—Sir W. H. Flower, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions to the menagerie during May, and Mr. Slater made some remarks on the animals inspected during a recent visit to the Zoological Gardens of Rotterdam, Amsterdam, Hanover, Berlin, and Hamburg.—Communications were read: from Dr. E. A. Goeldi, on the opossums of the Serra dos Orgaos, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from Dr. W. B. Benham, on a particularly abnormal vertebral column of the bull-frog (Rana mugiensis), and on certain other variations in the anurous column of this frog, and by Mr. L. Johnson on the pupils of the Felidae, in which he stated that the conclusion he had reached was that the natural shape of the pupil in Felis is circular. Although under various degrees of light one might get every shape from the circle through all degrees of oval to a perfectly vertical line, yet instillations of atropine or cocaine solutions caused every pupil to become a true circle. The younger the cat the greater the tendency for the pupil to become pointed oval in ordinary light, and, conversely, the older the cat the more frequently did we find a circular pupil. Brilliant light always caused contraction to oval, and direct sunlight to a thin line, in the smaller Felidae; in the larger Felidae Mr. Johnson had frequently found the pupils contract to a small circle.

Suddenly alarming a cat had the effect of momentarily dilating the pupil; while in sleep the pupil was always contracted. The communication was illustrated by models and diagrams.—Mr. O. Thomas gave an account of the gazelles of Algeria, chiefly based on specimens brought home by Sir E. Loder, and distinguished three unquestionable species, Gazella dorcas, G. cuvieri, and G. loderi, the last being a new species of which examples had been obtained by Sir E. Loder in the sand-hills three days south of Biskra. A fourth gazelle, of which a skin and skull had been bought by Sir E. Loder in Algiers many years ago, was referred with some doubt to Gazella corianna, the Corinne of Buffon.—Sir Edmund Loder gave an account of his expedition in search of the "reem," as the Gazella loderi is called by the Arabs, and stated what he had learnt of its habits and distribution, and also made remarks on the period of gestation of the Indian antelope, as observed in captivity.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—June 6.—Capt. H. J. Elwes, President, in the chair.—Dr. K. Jordan and the Hon. N. C. Rothschild were elected Fellows.—Mr. W. F. H. Blandford exhibited a series of eleven male specimens of Rhina barbinervis from British Honduras, of which the largest and smallest examples measure respectively 60 and 17 mm. The difference in bulk, supposing the proportions to be identical, is as 43 to 1. He remarked that this variation of the size is especially common in the Brentidae, Cosmoceridae, and other wood-boring Coleoptera.—The President, Dr. Sharp, the Rev. Canon Fowler, Mr. Jacoby, the Hon. W. Rothschild, Mr. Merfield, and Mr. Champion took part in the discussion which ensued.—Mr. A. J. Chitty exhibited specimens of Cardiophorus equicollis taken near Braunton, on the north coast of Devon, in May, 1891.—Mr. Champion and Mr. Blandford made some remarks on the species.—Mr. MacLachlan exhibited for Mr. J. W. Douglas male specimens of a coccid (Leucanum prunastri), bred from scales attached to shoots of blackthorn (Prunus spinosa) received from Herr E. Sulz, of Prague.—Mr. Douglas communicated notes on the subject, in which he stated that the species was common on blackthorn in France and Germany, and should be found in Britain.—Lord Walsingham exhibited a series of Cacecia podana, Neop., reared from larvae feeding on Lapageria and palms in Messrs. Veitch's conservatories in King's Road, Chelsea, including some very dark varieties.—The Hon. W. Rothschild stated that he had taken the species on lime.—Mr. Hampson and Mr. Tutt also made some remarks on the habits of the species.—Mr. C. Fenn exhibited a long series of Selenia lunaria, bred from one batch of eggs, which included both the spring and summer forms; and also two unforced specimens, which emerged in November. He remarked that the variation between the two emergences, viz., spring and summer, is considerable, and also the range of variation inter se, especially in the spring form; but it is very remarkable that the summer form has one or two representatives among the specimens of the spring emergence. He said that the parent female was taken at Boxley in May, 1893.—Mr. F. Lovell-Keays exhibited a variety of L. atezis (female), having the marginal ocelli on the hind wings entirely without the usual orange-coloured lunules. The specimen was captured at Caterham.—Mr. J. H. Durrant exhibited a series of Nygauptycha pygmaea, Hb., taken at Merton, Norfolk, between the 25th of March and the middle of April last.—Lord Walsingham made some remarks on the species.—Mr. H. Goss read an extract from a report from Mr. J. K. Preece, H.M. Consul at Ispahan, to the Foreign Office, on the subject of damage caused to the wheat crop in the district of Rafiojan by an insect which was called "gen" by the natives, and which he described as "like a flying bug, reddish olive in colour, with heavy broad shoulders." Mr. Goss said he had been asked by Mr. W. H. Preece to ascertain, if possible, the name of the species known to the natives as "gen."—Dr. Sharp said that in the absence of a specimen of the insect it was impossible to express an opinion as to the identity of the species.—Canon Fowler exhibited for Miss Ormerod specimens of Diloboderus abderus, Sturm, Eucranium arachnoides, Brull., and Megathopa violacea, Blanch., which she had received from the La Plata district of the Argentine territories, where they were said to be damaging the grass crops. He also read notes from Miss Ormerod on the subject.—Mr. Hampson raised an important point as to what was the legal "date of publication" of Part I. of the Transactions of the Society, 1894. He pointed out that the question of the priority of the names of certain new species described therein would depend upon the date of publication.—A long discussion then ensued, in which Dr. Sharp, Hon. W. Rothschild, Mr. Goss, Mr. MacLachlan, Lord Walsingham, Prof. Foulton, and Mr. Verrall took part.—Prof. F. Klápálek, of Prague, communicated a paper entitled 'Descriptions of a New Species of Raphidia, L., and of Three New Species of Trichoptera from the Balkan Peninsula, with Critical Remarks on Panorpa gibberosa, McLach.'—Lord Walsingham then took the chair, and a special meeting, convened under chap. xviii. of the by-laws, was held.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Geographical, 8.—'A Survey of the English Lakes,' Mr. H. B. Mill.
- Tues. Sociological, 11.—'A Comparison of the Realized Wealth and of the Economic Condition of France and England, especially as relating to their Agricultural Production and their Security in Case of War,' Mr. W. J. Harris.
- Wed. Zoological, 10.—'Lepidoptera and Protoplasma,' Prof. May Lancaster.—'Notes on some Specimens of Antlers of the Fallow Deer, showing Continuous Variation and the Effect of Tumor or Partial Castration,' Dr. G. H. Fowler.—'Purported Fleas of Nucleus in some Birds,' Mr. P. G. Mitchell.
- Colonial Institute, 8.
- Wen. Geological, 8.—'Deep Borings at Calicut and Winkfield, with Notes on those at Ware and Chesham,' Mr. W. Whitaker and A. J. S. Jones.—'Seven other Papers.'
- Microscopical, 8.—'Curiosity of certain Characters generally accepted for Specific Diagnosis in the Infusorian,' Mr. T. Gieseler.—'Fossilization of the Skull of Falcated,' Mr. F. Chapman.
- Pol. Soc., 8.—'The Old Norwegian Specimen,' Prof. K. Meyer.—'Ghostly Lights,' Mr. J. J. Walhouse.

- Society of Arts, 8.—'Conformations.'
- Sat. Botanic, 10.—'Election of Fellows.'

Science Society.

Dr. G. W. BALFOUR, of Edinburgh, has written a volume on 'The Sunile Heart: its Symptoms, Sequela, and Treatment,' which Messrs. Black are to publish.

A BIOGRAPHY of the late Dr. John Rae, the Arctic traveller, being in course of preparation, Mrs. Rae will be obliged by the loan of any correspondence or other documents likely to help her. Her address is 10, Royal Terrace, Warrior Square, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

THE fifth deep-sea voyage of exploration undertaken under the auspices of the Academy of Sciences at Vienna will shortly be carried out, under the direction of Dr. Steindachner, the head of the Zoological Department of the Natural History Hofmuseum. The object of the expedition will be the Mediterranean.

FINE ARTS

Italian Painters: Critical Studies of their Works. By G. Morelli. Translated from the German by C. J. Ffoulkes. Illustrated. (Murray.)

It is difficult to understand why Miss Ffoulkes, who is favourably known as the translator of one or two works on art, selected for translation the least courteous and modest of the works of the late Signor Morelli. The lady's industry is more worthy of our respect than her judgment. She is occasionally a little at fault in rendering German terms of art, but it is right to say that Signor Morelli himself did not invariably employ them in the strictest way. We think the lady should have taken a warning from the very first paragraph of Signor Morelli's almost incredibly self-sufficient "Preface," in which he has the courage to say that while the book is in the main a reproduction of a former work called 'Italian Masters in German Galleries,' that sufficiently arrogant publication "has long been out of print," and therefore needed to be reprinted. There was really little need for another translation. Had Miss Ffoulkes been in a position to appreciate the drift of public opinion, she would have observed that critics are weary of Signor Morelli's attacks on Dr. Bode and his allusions to Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle. Arrogance such as his generally overshoots its mark, and ensures sympathy for the objects of its hostility.

That Signor Morelli had awarded to Domenico Campagnola certain drawings which uncritical opinions, or rather habits of judgment, had long ascribed to Titian and Giorgione, has been the source of infinite gratification to the Senator and his friends, whose critical acumen may be measured by the readiness with which they deny to every artist but Campagnola every Venetian idyl in chalk or ink that is put into their hands. It is natural, therefore, that, in the new version of this book, the importance of Domenico as a quasi-Titianesque draughtsman should be enlarged upon. Like all shibboleths, it requires judgment in its employment, and too often leads to the ascription to Campagnola of all the rubbish of that school which ranks as Venetian works from the republic's continental domains. That Giovanni Cariani, of Bergamo (a special pet of Signor Morelli's, whom he may be said to have discovered in the latter stage of his critical studies, and valued accordingly), should again obtain a few pages of notice, rehabilitating his renown, will surprise no one who has observed the intensity of a paternal affection which had been stimulated by opposition. As to this Bergamasque artist, we may say, dismissing the hardy assumptions of Signor Morelli, that there is scarcely anything known about him, while the least questionable of the works bearing his always obscure name is very inferior indeed to some of those which Signor Morelli has been bold enough to ascribe to him.

In respect to drawings such as the so-called Titians, Giorgiones, Palmas, and Campagnolas the author was on much safer ground when he employed photographs for the purpose of forming an opinion upon them than when, as he was much too apt to do, he did the same thing when comparing pictures, and founded widely extended theories upon such untrustworthy examinations. In his additions to this book it is gratifying to find that, while he congratulates himself upon what he assumes to be changes in German public galleries due to his dicta, he is good enough to own to errors and offer fresh decisions, many of which have no better authority than his "convictions" and assertions.

It was certain that when a new edition of 'Italian Masters' was in hand the author would say much about a theory which developed and enlarged a whole class of "Northern, and principally Flemish" copyists. That such worthies existed, and were industrious as well as nefarious, was a fact known long before Signor Morelli was born, and has never been doubted by anybody for a moment. The names of some of them have not been forgotten, and the motives of their employers are well understood, but that all, or anything like all, the pictures Signor Morelli damned as due to the Flemish copyists are really such is not credible, unless the whereabouts of the originals is known. In support of the Flemish copyist theory applied in excess of the circumstances, it has been alleged that so great a number of originals as the catalogues describe could not possibly be due to one hand working during a life of the ordinary duration. On this point it is not to be forgotten that, apart from masters like Rembrandt, Rubens, and Teniers, who were really the chiefs of art factories, the numbers of pictures ascribed to great men are not really anything like so large as at first sight they appear to be. There is nothing, surely, wonderful in an old master producing, say, a hundred and fifty pictures; Mr. Alma Tadema has already signed his "Op. cxxvii."

Replicas and works of inferior masters of the great schools are quite sufficient to account for the great numbers of pictures bearing the names of the leaders of those schools, whose facile methods must also be allowed for when we reckon their output. They were enabled to produce pictures in much greater numbers than our slower modes permit, or the shortness of many of the artists' lives would appear to render possible; but this shortness, no one ought to forget, was often more apparent than real, the fact being that, of Signor Morelli's Italian masters, the majority undoubtedly produced pictures at an age when modern painters are still at school. Though intending to become an artist, a boy is nowadays considered a dunce if he leaves school at so early an age as fourteen, and is not examined in every subject but those in which art is concerned; while in Italy in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries boys destined to be artists never, in the modern sense, went to school at all, but began to draw and paint while they were yet little more than infants, spent their childhood in the shops of their masters, and set up for themselves before they were twenty.

It does not need an Italian senator to tell critics trained in technical methods where the crisp and dexterous, but laboured touches of the copyists, Flemish or otherwise, differ from the firm and spontaneous handling of the true masters. It is one of the pleasing delusions of dilettanti such as Signor Morelli that they alone can discriminate the old lamps from the new; and one of the most edifying of these impulses of vanity is that of our author that the so-called Flemish copyist was quite unknown until he wrote about "the question of the authorship of a great number of pictures in public and private collections, as to which I am convinced, after many years of careful study, that although they pass for work by Italian masters, they are in reality for the most part imitations by Northern and principally by Flemish painters. By commenting more fully than has hitherto been done upon the large number of Italian pictures, whether with right or wrong attributions, which are to be found in other European collections besides those specially noticed, I trust that I may have assisted beginners in art-criticism, and have afforded them more copious materials for their own studies.....It was not, however, my intention to produce a book to be admired, but rather one that might be read with profit before the pictures themselves."

While we must complain of what we may, without intending an offence, call the pettifoggish methods of Signor Morelli in dealing with details, it is only fair to acknowledge that there are occasional instances of a certain breadth of view in the notice of the Dresden Gallery. Yet even these notices, or most of them, are but commonplace; for example, there is a long and authoritative passage on pp. 153 and 154, in which the writer dilates on the effect of social and political developments in Italy upon Correggio, Giorgione, Buonarrotti, and Da Vinci, which would be out of place, because of its triteness, anywhere except in a primer of art history. In details of criticism we have many occasions for agreeing with him; for example, as to what he says of Rumohr on p. 127, and of the famous 'Reading Magdalen,' in the Dresden Gallery, long ascribed—but on grounds which are, to say the least of them, inconclusive—to Correggio. Yet, without attempting to find a better name for this pretty thing, we unhesitatingly refuse to attribute it to Van der Werff, to whom Signor Morelli allots it. The assertion "that it could not possibly have been by an Italian, and, least of all, by an Italian of the early part of the sixteenth century," is, however, good, so far as the date is concerned, although the other part of it is, we think, open to question. There is a good deal of truth in the remark that such a "Repentant Magdalen" is "simply a Jesuit rendering of the Venus of the Venetian painters," and in the assertion that between Giorgione's exquisite Venus and Correggio's (so-called) 'Repentant Magdalen,' "lies the whole range of Spanish-Catholic Counter-Reformation." Even this sarcastic passage is not new when applied to the "Magdalens" in question. More than fifty years ago Browning, moved by a picture by Machi in the British Institution of 1842, wrote of the old masters whom the lovers 'In a Gondola' were loth to disturb:—

Oh, could you take them by surprise,
You'd find Schidone's eager Duke
Doing the quaintest courtesies
To that prim Saint by "Haste-thee-Luke!"
And, deeper into her rock den,
Bold Castelfranco's Magdalen
You'd find retreated from the ken
Of that robed counsel-keeping Ser—
As if the Tizian thinks of her,
And is not, rather, gravely bent
On seeing for himself what toys
Are these, his progeny invent,
What litter now the board employs Whereon he signed a document
That got him murdered!

Miss Ffoulkes has performed her task with a light, neat, and careful hand, and in a spirit which preserves the lively and insouciant style of her original. She makes a mistake, as we have already said, now and then, but not very often, in rendering those technical terms which entrap the amateur who has to do with painting. For instance, we are told that Leonardo attained "an intimate knowledge of pictorial modelling, that is, of chiaroscuro." The last is, indeed, a beautiful term, but Miss Ffoulkes may take our word that it is but slightly, if at all, related to "pictorial modelling," whatever may be meant by such a phrase. Some of the illustrations are good and sufficient for the purpose, many others are indifferent, while some are simply bad.

The Illustrated Archaeologist. Edited by J. Romilly Allen. Vol. I. (C. J. Clark.)—The fourth part completes the first volume of this excellent magazine, which is now published with an index in a neat cloth cover, and we advise antiquaries to obtain it before it is too late. It does not cost much, and, unless we are mistaken, the time will come when many will covet a complete set and find it hard to get. We have already noticed the first three parts. The fourth is good, but scarcely up to the average level, and there is a rather undue proportion of borrowed prints. The first article is by Mr. Edward Lovett on 'Prehistoric Man in Jersey,' being an account of the examination of a "neolithic" cave there with figures of the cave and of some of the objects found in it. Then come 'Notes on the Corporation Plate and Insignia of Wiltshire,' by Mr. E. H. Goddard, illustrated by some good blocks lent by the Wilts Archaeological Society. Mr. C. O. Hodges follows with an article on the remarkable early church at Escomb in Durham; but he does not show himself to be particularly competent to deal with such a subject. The history of English church building from the beginning of the seventh century to the end of the eleventh has not been studied with such success as has that of the centuries which follow, and men are only slowly becoming convinced that the still existing examples are much commoner than has been generally believed. Still it is rather startling to be told in print that the western porch of Monkwearmouth Church "is the only instance in which turned baluster shafts have been found in situ, and, but for this fortunate circumstance, their exact use would have been unknown." If Mr. Hodges has never heard of the churches of Brixworth and Earl's Barton in Northamptonshire, Barton-on-Humber in Lincolnshire, and some scores of others in which these shafts still remain in place, he might at least have discovered for himself that there are baluster shafts in the belfry windows as well as in the west doorway at Wearmouth. But though his essay may not be worth much, the illustrations will be useful. There are a good plan and several views reproduced from photographs taken before and after its repair. It is here called a "restoration"; but the architect to whom the care of the old church was given—the lamented R. J. Johnson, of Newcastle—knew better than to treat it in the way which that misused word has come to imply, and it is not to be reckoned as a thing of the past. After Mr. Hodges, Mr. J. C. Wall follows with a popular account of old pilgrims' signs and their use, with figures, most of which are old friends; and the rest of the part is taken up with "notes" and reviews of books. The "notes" are very good this quarter, but we miss the "notes in the sale-room," which we hope will not be given up. One note on 'An Unexplained Feature in the Church of Walpole St. Andrew, Norfolk,' makes a puzzle where none exists. The thing is neither more nor less than the base of a pulpit. There was another like it in the neighbouring church of Walpole St. Peter.

THE SALONS. (Fourth Notice.)

As was to be expected from the appearance of so many volumes of unpublished memoirs about the First Empire, and the extraordinary success of Sardou's 'Madame Sans-Gêne' at the Vaudeville, there has been a revival of Bonaparte and Napoleon among the artists. It is at the Champs Elysées especially, where what survives of "historical painting" and the "genre historique" still finds an asylum, that this is to be seen. M. Lecomte-du-Noüy and M. Boissacompé show us Bonaparte at the beginning of his career, predicting to some surprised and respectable people his future destiny: "Croyez-moi, il viendra un homme qui saura réunir sur sa tête toutes les espérances de la nation." See the Souper de Beaucaire (No. 1106) and Bonaparte à Nice (217).—M. J. Girardet introduces us to the Passage des Alpes (825) at the moment Bonaparte is received by the monks of the Great St. Bernard.—M. Georges Cain escorts us to the general rehearsal of Madame Sans-Gêne (351); M. Lionel Royer to Tilsitt (1010); M. Cormon to Eylau (476); M. Perboyre to Wagram (1433); M. Chartier to Waterloo (415); M. Boutigny to Eading (264), &c.—As for M. Paul Laurons, he has endeavoured to illustrate the scene admirably described by Alfred de Vigny in 'Grandeur et Servitude militaires,' and has confronted Le Pape et l'Empereur (1072). All this illustration of a remarkable epoch interests the public, and a great deal of ability can be thrown into it. Still it occupies but a small place in the general movement of contemporary art.

The portraits, too, taken as a whole, are singularly insignificant, and after seeing so many indifferent faces lining the walls of the two Salons, one wonders at the craving for surviving which sustains poor humanity. When in the tomb of the ancient Egyptian empire we discover a vast number of portraits, the realism of which astonishes us, we explain this extraordinary development of iconophily by the peculiarities of Egyptian religious beliefs. In the opinion of the Egyptian, immortality was not assured except on the condition of preserving after the earthly existence a replica as faithful as possible of the bodily resemblance. The soul, being a double and a sort of aerial projection of the body, had need for its continuance of a permanent support. Now in spite of the science of the embalmer and the complication of the seals of the tomb, the mummy could fade away or be stolen; but the portraits offered an additional chance of immortality by multiplying the exact resemblance of the original. They therefore had to be of a scrupulous fidelity: there was no question of flattering the vanity of the living, but of taking precautions for remaining on the other side of the grave identical with oneself: hence physical defects, and even deformities, became venerable, and were scrupulously registered in this descriptive passport to eternity. Such a doctrine proved an admirable school for the portrait painter, and we are indebted to him for sundry masterpieces that are now more than five thousand years old.

When M. Prudhomme or M. Jourdain has his portrait painted nowadays, he obeys, on the whole, somewhat similar motives: he desires to survive. But as his religion, when he has one, does not exact, in the ultra-terrestrial interests of his soul, the presence of a remorselessly faithful representation of his perishable features, he is quite contented to leave behind him a document that is a trifle complimentary. This is what painters call an idealized portrait; and the most idealized are the most marketable. Modern iconography is thus full of falsehoods—photography itself has discovered ways of lying. Three-fourths of the portraits do not deserve to have a word wasted upon them; still there are some that are interesting.

"Pour bien tirer un personnage au vil," as was said in the time of Clouet, there is no need to go "seeking for midday at two o'clock," as so many painters do nowadays. The most "direct" portraits are the most convincing.

Peins-moi, Janet, peins-moi, je te supplie,
Sur ce tableau les beautés de ma mie,
De la façon que je te le dirai.

exclaimed Runaari, and in a simple "crayon," without trickery or complication, the loyal, truthful, and charming master knew how to convey the living and faithful resemblance:—

Il suffit bien, si tu la sais pourtrair
Telle qu'elle est, sans vouloir déguiser
Son naturel pour la flatter.

This straightforward simplicity, this fine and persistent sobriety, is most rare nowadays. The art of painting has become, as the temper of our age has, charged with intentions and subtleties: we seek in the external features the most remote thoughts of the inner man; we pride ourselves on our psychology. Round the figure evoked several painters endeavour to place a symphonic accompaniment—"suggestive," as the slang of the day goes, whether it be right or wrong.

Mr. Whistler has founded a school. He exhibits this year at the Champ de Mars the portrait of one of his most fervent admirers, M. le Comte Robert de Montesquieu-Flezenac (1186). M. de Montesquieu is a most refined aesthete, whom the thought of being simple and looking like other people suffices to render ill, who writes verses that are laboriously obscure, in which he does his best to obliterate under a surplussage of inappropriate words and vague epithets whatever he may have derived from his ancestors of the instinctive need of clearness. The initiated assert that he has succeeded. M. de Montesquieu is an artist; he composes or dreams furniture, and a Psyche of his may be found this year among the objets d'art. Mr. Whistler's portrait represents him—and will preserve him for the admiration of posterity—in a harmony of black and gold—in evening dress, gloved with a glove that is derived, no doubt, from the cast-off properties of Barbey d'Aurevilly, armed with a switch, serpent, with a small restless head at the top of a long spiral body.

Mr. Whistler has many imitators. Every time that you perceive in the midst of a more or less mysterious canvas a shadow slowly rising and taking many ways of pulling on or disposing of a glove, or even of doing nothing at all, do not hesitate to detect the results of his influence.

ANDRÉ MICHEL.

NOTES FROM THE EUPHRATES VALLEY.

Malatia, May 17, 1894.

Now that we are about half-way in our journey from coast to coast by way of the Euphrates valley, it may interest some readers of the Athenæum to know how our archaeological exploration has fared.

After a delay at Tarsus and Adana, due to bad luck and officialdom, we started about a month ago and came straight to Aintab. There is little to record of the road so far. We examined carefully the ruins of Mopsuestia, where the double sites on both banks of the Pyramus show much still above ground, and copied several inscriptions, including a milestone of Valentinian. After crossing the Amanus, we spent a day with Drs. von Luschan and Koldewey at Zinjerli, seeing the different palaces and the medley of monuments, Assyrian, "Hittite," and old Semitic, which that extraordinary mound is yielding up to the spade. The harvest to be reaped in the Zinjerli plain is far from exhausted yet. There are two other mounds upon it in every way similar to Zinjerli itself, from both of which sculptures have been obtained already; and Dr. von Luschan urges strongly the necessity of excavating both. Any one who can obtain the necessary funds will have Dr. von Luschan's cordial co-operation, and in all probability find monuments not less notable than those obtained from Zinjerli. Aintab proved to be a mine of small "Hittite" antiquities, seals, axe and chisel heads, cylinders, and scarabei, whence obtained I could not learn satisfactorily. One small stone boss, engraved on the two sides with figures of a god and a mortal, accompanied by hieroglyphic legends, is worthy to be compared with any "Hittite" treasure in any European museum, and several other pieces are of exceptional interest.

From Aintab we made for the Euphrates, and struck the river at Khalfat. As the Gyuk Su, a right-bank tributary, is unfordable at this season, we were obliged to cross the Euphrates—not a pleasant experience when the river is swirling through its gorge, swollen by melted snows. Striking across a bend, we recrossed the stream just above Samat, and spent two or three days in the miserable village which now represents Samosata. The ancient city lay immediately about the castle mound, and its limits are still to be seen. The modern village appears to occupy the situation of the legionary camp. We found an altar and two tiles inscribed "Legio XVI. Flavia Firma," and a few other inscriptions, but the site is not prolific. I made a copy and impression of the rudely inscribed and much decayed Hittite stèle which lies near the castle, but, not having Humann and Puchstein's book with me, cannot tell whether I have improved in any way on their publication.

The most remarkable relic of ancient Samosata is undoubtedly the great aqueduct by which water was brought some twenty miles from the Kiakhta river into the town. The stream flows mainly through tunnels, but is carried on arches across the mouths of numerous ravines running down to the Euphrates. These bridges are very massive, and present the appearance of having been strengthened at a period later than that of their first erection by masonry built within the arches. It must be owing to them that an idea prevails that on the Euphrates the Romans defended their frontier by walling up the mouths of the lateral ravines. We followed the aqueduct to its junction with the Kiakhta, and, after fording the river with great difficulty and some danger, made our way up to Kiakhta, abandoning, owing to the height of the tributary streams, the project of following the right bank of the Euphrates through the Taurus. Some of the party reached the same place by way of Adiaman, visiting on the way the site of Perre, about two hours distant from that town.

Kiakhta lies near two relics of antiquity, each unique in its way: the famous monument on the Nimrud Daghi, and the great Roman bridge over the Kiakhta river. The latter has been used ever since the time of Vespasian, and nothing but powerful explosives could ruin it now. Seen either from the roadway, where the massive balustrade and inscribed columns and tablets are before the traveller's eyes, or from below, where the full magnitude of the single arch, 70 ft. high and 115 ft. span, can be appreciated, this magnificent monument of Roman rule, still intact in a wild glen on the extreme limit of the empire, must make a strange impression on any beholder. It carried beyond question the great military road from Melitene through the Taurus to Perre and Samosata, and, indeed, the roadway can be seen running from the eastern end of the bridge up into the mountains. This military highway did not, therefore, take the Adiaman-Bozno-Pulat pass, as has been supposed, but a more easterly line, probably that of an easy path still much used as a route from Adiaman and Kiakhta, which goes by way of Birnische and Bekiakr to Malatia, in about twenty hours from the bridge. We proposed to follow its line across Taurus, but native guides disposed, and took us by a hill-track, often so narrow that our packhorses had to be unloaded and led across bad places and reloaded again; and it was rendered still more difficult at this season by treacherous snow bridges across the gullies. We toiled up and down precipices for two days, always hoping to strike again the line of the old roadway, but in vain. Our horses rolled down snow-slopes, or broke through snow bridges, or half-drowned themselves and their loads in swollen torrents, and when we struggled through at last to Malatia, we had had enough of the Taurus in a backward May!

Under the inscription of Julia Domna on the Kiakhta bridge is a long-erased text of which I made out a letter here and there, agreeing with the formula of Vespasian. Even without that evidence the probability would be all in favour of that emperor being the original builder of this great bridge in the country which he was the first to reduce to the status of a province. The stèle of Septimius Severus and his sons, which are also on the bridge, and the honorific dedications by the four cities of Commagene to Caracalla and Julia Domna, point to the same fact as the milestones on the Cusara-Melitene road, viz., that an important reorganization of the frontier was made at the end of the second century. Arrived here we were at once told on all sides that a stone five thousand years old had been found a few days back at Ordasu, on a mound called Arslan Tepe, about three miles distant from the site of Melitene. We were taken to view it at the Government House, and there, sure enough, lay a most notable "Hittite" relief with a text in raised symbols running along the top. The scene is a lion hunt; an unmistakably "Hittite" archer, standing in a chariot, draws an arrow to its head. A driver guides a spirited horse, beside which is a dog. In front ramps a great lion, already pierced with a bolt, looking back at his pursuers. The scene is in a sunken panel of white limestone, admirably preserved. Two fragments of another panel were found at the same time, on which a woman sits opposite a goddess, a cross-legged table of offerings being between the two, while on the right is the hinder part of another chariot, in which stands a man in the act of drawing an arrow from the quiver at his shoulder. We shall visit Arslan Tepe before we leave Malatia; there can be no doubt that it is the site of yet another "Hittite" mound-palace, similar to those of Eyuk and Zinjirli, and it is interesting to note that it supplies a missing link on the line of the road from Central Cappadocia, which descends the Tokhma Su, by way of the "Hittite" monuments of Gurun, Palanga, and Arslan Tash, to the Euphrates. The absolutely similar character of these widely scattered "Hittite" mound-palaces of Syria and Asia Minor, and the unmistakable identity of the art displayed on their reliefs, is a very remarkable and significant fact, which is gradually forcing itself into a prominent place in the field of ancient history.

We hope to continue our journey in two or three days' time up the right bank of the river, but cholera is about, and rumours of quarantine are in the air, and our plans may be frustrated.

D. G. HOGARTH.

A PERSIAN INSCRIPTION.

To Mr. H. E. M. James, Commissioner in Sind, the British Museum is indebted for a paper cast of a curious inscription kept as a great treasure in a shrine on Khwajah Khizr Island, opposite Rohri, on the Indus, and jealously guarded from the gaze of the vulgar. The inscription consists of a Persian couplet, which reads as follows:—

Chu in dergah i 'alâ shud huvelâ—bi âb i Khizr dâred dar javân, Khizr bi khatt i shair dar nivishte—peî lâfzesh az dergah i 'alâ.

When this noble structure shone forth, endowed with the water of Khizr in (perennial) youth, Khizr, with graceful scrip, inscribed for its date the words "dergah i 'alâ" (lofty shrine).

In Persian poetry Khizr, the ever-living saint, is always associated with the water of immortality, and in the valley of the Indus he is an object of worship alike to Hindus and Mohammedans. Capt. (the late Sir Richard) Burton in his work on Sind gives an interesting specimen of the Sindhi hymn, in which Khizr is invoked as the tutelary deity of the mighty stream. The Hijrah year 341 (A.D. 952), expressed by the above chronogram dergah i 'alâ, and engraved in Arabic figures underneath, is a very early date for the erection of his shrine. On whatever authority it may rest, the above inscription is no contemporary evidence. Its character, an elegant Indian Nestalik, can hardly be earlier than the seventeenth or sixteenth century. The style also is decidedly modern, and not so elegant as the character. Der javân is an awkward and inadequate expression of the idea intended, and the az in the last hemistich smacks of Indian Persian.

THE LATE MR. J. M. GRAY.

National Portrait Gallery Offices.

WHILE mourning the loss of my most highly valued friend John Miller Gray, of Edinburgh, a fellow worker in the field of portraiture and historical research, and a most genial companion, who died suddenly in March last, I read with considerable emotion a letter from him in the Athenæum of April 14th, which seemed to me as a voice from another world. It was really written during his last illness, and a reference to me in that letter showed that my name was on his dying lips.

I now wish, before it is too late, in common with a host of other friends, who have already borne testimony to his high worth and generous unselfish nature, to record my full sense of his rare qualifications for the duties to which circumstances had fortunately led him, as Curator of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery. Gray was devoted to history. He had a strong natural perception of form (an essential qualification for the identification of likenesses), a quick memory, with indomitable energy and sagacity in penetrating to the origin and groundwork of whatever came before him. He was well able to sift evidence. His industry and extensive reading were shown in the varied and numerous reviews which he contributed to the leading periodicals both of London and Edinburgh, many containing monographs on portrait collections in ancestral houses; and his essays on Burns and the Tassies will be constantly referred to.

He completed an excellent Catalogue of the Loan Collection of Portraits at Edinburgh in 1885. One of his most useful and characteristic productions was his history of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery, opened in state at Edinburgh July 15th, 1889, which was printed in 1891 with illustrations. He there gave a clear account of the origin of the gallery and its progress, fostered by the munificence of an anonymous benefactor, whose honoured name, John R. Findlay, was first revealed on the occasion of the state inauguration. My high appreciation of Mr. J. M. Gray's qualifications had long determined me to endeavour to obtain his co-operation in carrying out the arduous task which still remains before me of arranging the portraits on the walls of the new building, now nearing completion, in the neighbourhood of Charing Cross. Mr. Gray had already become acquainted with my wishes, and I had every reason to hope that arrangements might have been made for realization of the scheme.

Gray was of a responsive disposition, and always ready to impart information to others from his abundant stores of knowledge. I feel his loss as that of a younger brother who would most ably have assisted in carrying out the projects I had in view.

GEORGE SCHARF.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 9th inst. the following pictures, from the collections of the late Mr. A. Dennistoun and others: R. Ansdell, Stag and Dogs, 204l. J. F. Herring, sen., Feeding the Horse, 147l. A. Kauffmann, Children, with fruit, 262l.; Children, with a bird's nest, 210l. W. F. Witherington, The Cornfield, 115l. E. W. Hals, A Boor in Red Cap and Jacket, 105l.

The same auctioneers sold on the 12th inst. the following engravings, from various collections: R. Morghen, The Last Supper, after Leonardo da Vinci, 63l. Rembrandt, The Cottage with White Pales, 38l. R. Strange, Charles I. with the Duke of Hamilton, after Van Dyck, 43l. After Sir E. Landseer, Children of the Mist, by T. Landseer, 29l.; The Monarch of the Glen, by T. Landseer, 76l.; The Challenge, by J. Burnet, 25l. After J. Constable, The Vale of Dedham, by D. Lucas, 92l.

THE ART GALLIES.

THE third general meeting of the Society of Antiquaries of Ireland for the year 1894 will be held at Carnarvon (by invitation of the Cambrian Archaeological Association) in the evening of Monday next. The papers to be read on the occasion are: 'Implements from the Larne Raised Beach' and 'Irish Arrow-heads,' by the Rev. George R. Buick, Vice-President; 'Irish Art as shown on Irish Crosses,' by the Rev. Denis Murphy, Vice-President; 'British Pottery at Silchester and the Potter's Wheel in Ireland,' by the Rev. Leonard Hæssé; 'Notes on the Progress of the Antiquarian Photographic Survey of Ireland,' by Mr. J. L. Robinson, Hon. Provincial Secretary for Leinster; 'The Old Session Book of Temple Patrick Presbyterian Church,' by the Rev. W. T. Latimer; 'The Fitzgeralds of Rostellane, co. Cork,' by Mr. R. G. Unisacke Fitzgerald; and on 'Prehistoric Ornament in Ireland and its Relation to Cup and Circle Markings,' by Mr. G. Coffey. Excursions are to be made on Tuesday to Bangor and Conway, Gloydya, Llanrwst Church, and Bettwa-y-Coed; on Wednesday, to Llanabhaiarn; on Thursday, by steamer from Carnarvon to Beaumaris; on Friday, to Llanberis; while on Saturday the remains of the Roman city of Segontium and Carnarvon Castle and church will be visited. The seven churches and other antiquities at Glendalough will be visited on Saturday, the 1st of September.

PROV. JESS, as President, will take the chair at the annual meeting of the Hellenic Society, to be held at 22, Albemarle Street, on Monday next, at 5 p.m., and will deliver an address on the progress of Hellenic studies during the past year.

To correct a misapprehension which seems to be somewhat general, we may mention that the fine unfinished portrait of Romney by himself, lately sold at Christie's, was acquired, not, as has been stated, for the National Gallery, but for the National Portrait Gallery. On the other hand, several acquisitions of old Italian pictures were made for the National Gallery at the sale of the collection left by Lady Eastlake, including the small diptych attributed to Ercole Roberti, the small Ambrogio Borgognone, and the picture bearing the rare signature of Andrea Correggiali.

A PORTION of the library of Mr. Crawhall, formerly of Newcastle-on-Tyne, will be sold at Messrs. Sotheby's on June 23rd. The selection includes a series of albums of humorous sketches by Mr. Crawhall, to which the late Charles S. Keene was indebted for the suggestions of some of his best-known illustrations in Punch. Mr. Layard refers to this in his life of Keene, and in the albums are letters from Keene to Mr. Crawhall generously acknowledging his indebtedness. Keene's treatment of the subjects is in many cases inserted opposite the original sketches. There is also a series of drawings for Punch by Keene, all of which were presented by him to Mr. Crawhall.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD, VALADON & Co. invite visitors to a private view, to be held in their gallery, 5, Regent Street, Pall Mall, to-day (Saturday), of a number of paintings by Troyon. The public will be admitted on Monday next, and the exhibition will be open for about a month.

MR. JOHN BRETT, observing that, although his brethren of the Royal Academy give medals and other prizes for landscape painting, they do not profess to teach it, proposes to receive a class of pupils at his house, Daisyfield, Putney, for instruction. They will have the advantage of the adjoining heath to draw and paint on. The notion seems a good one.

SOME misstatements having been circulated with regard to the purchases made by the committee administering the remnant of the Madox Brown Fund, it may be well to say that the committee bought at the sale of the deceased artist his large cartoon of 'William the Conqueror,' representing the body of Harold brought to the Conqueror, exhibited at Westminster Hall in 1844, which it is intended to offer to a minor public gallery of art in London. The National Gallery has already received Madox Brown's 'Christ washing Peter's Feet,' his 'Last of England' being at Birmingham, and, besides his paintings in the Town Hall, his 'Work' at Manchester. The committee bought a number of smaller cartoons for distribution to local galleries and art schools. A cartoon of 'Justice,' which was also at Westminster Hall, has been bought by another authority, for, as we understand, the gallery at Liverpool. This, too, is a noble piece of monumental art, compact of dignity and beauty, and worthy of any public collection, however ambitious and select it may be.

A GENERAL meeting of the Society for the Encouragement and Preservation of Indian Art is to take place in the Indian Conference Room at the Imperial Institute on Monday at four o'clock. Sir James Linton is expected to take the chair. The society is badly off for funds, and needs fresh subscribers. A petition, by the way, for the preservation of ancient monuments in India has been presented to Mr. Fowler. The Royal Academy, the Society of Antiquaries, the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings, and the Archaeological Institute have joined in the petition. The Department of Public Works is nearly as destructive, it would seem, as Mr. Five per Cent. here.

THE death is announced of the celebrated Spanish painter Don Federico de Madrazo. The son of Jose Madrazo, the noted artist, he was born at Rome in 1815. He studied at Paris under Winterhalter, and was a frequent exhibitor at the Salons. He obtained a Third Class Medal in 1838, a Second Class in 1839, and First Class Medals in 1845 and 1855, and a rapport in 1878. He became a Correspondent of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1853, and a Foreign Associate in place of Schnorr in 1873. He obtained the Legion of Honour in 1846, and became an Officer in 1878. He was for many years the fashionable portrait painter of Madrid, and Keeper of the Museum of Painting and Director of the School of Painting. All visitors to Madrid who cared for the fine arts were charmed by Don Federico's high-bred courtesy and genuine desire to aid them; but he had long been in failing health. His son Don Raymundo is also an artist of high distinction.

THE Burlington Club's exhibition of pictures by old masters, chiefly of the Ferrarese School, contains, no doubt, a considerable proportion of questionable works—copies, for instance—and pictures inherently bad; but there are not a few that are supremely interesting. Among these is the very fine and pathetic 'Pieta,' from the Roscoe Collection at Liverpool, which was formerly attributed to Mantegna (whose work it does not at all resemble). There is, too, a remarkably good 'Entombment' by the same interesting master. Marco Zoppo is admirably represented by more than one capital work; the best is enriched with painted fruits and richly coloured marbles, parts of the throne of the Virgin, such as were commonly introduced by Venetian painters, and were probably due to the influence of the Byzantine mosaics and other decorations with which the old Venetian masters were very familiar. There are also works by Cosimo Tura, Lorenzo Costa (see 'A Concert,' No. 14), Lorenzo Lotto, Perugino (or his scholars), a questionable Francia or two, and a still more questionable Correggio, as well as several exceedingly fine Dosso Dossis, especially a 'Circus,' No. 54.

MR. P. G. HAMERTON will contribute to the second number of the Yellow Book a criticism of the drawings and of the letterpress published in the first number.

DR. WORMANN, the Director of the Royal Galleries at Dresden, is preparing for publication a series of facsimiles of the most important examples in the collection of drawings by old masters under his care. The selection is to include upwards of three hundred specimens, and to be accompanied by a critical text from the pen of the Director.

EXCAVATIONS are going on at a place called Fideah, in the case of Homs, in Asiatic Turkey. They are under the direction of M. Gratier, a French architect, but all objects excavated are to go to the Imperial Museum at Constantinople.

AN addition to the archaeological parties in Asia Minor this season is that of Messrs. Emile Sonto and Edward Oula. They will visit Mazin, the ancient Horacles, Alabanda, Halicarnassus, Mylasa, Stratonicea, Lagina, and Moughla, in Southern Caria, in continuation of the last year's explorations of Profs. Koornichek and Ratchel in Eastern Caria.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—'Rigoletto'; Production of M. Massenet's 'Werther'; 'Roméo et Juliette'.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Wolff Musical Union.
QUEEN'S HALL.—Philharmonic Society.

THE revival of certain decayed operas at Covent Garden last week is understood to be due to the desire of Madame Melba to prove that the genuine Italian school of vocalization is not extinct. The Australian artist is an excellent witness to this effect, for after her delightful singing in 'Lucia,' she offered an impersonation of Gilda in Verdi's 'Rigoletto' last Saturday, which, from a strictly vocal point of view, could not be easily surpassed. Signor Ancona sang the part of the Jester superbly, and avoided the melodramatic exaggerations into which exponents of this character frequently fall. Words of commendation are due to Signor de Lucia as the Duke and Mlle. Giulia Ravogli as Maddalena.

M. Massenet's 'Werther,' produced for the first time in London on Monday evening for the rentrée of M. Jean de Reszke, is understood to have been mounted at the special request of the Polish tenor, who has achieved a great success in the titular part on the other side of the Atlantic. First performed at Vienna two years ago, the work at once made a profound impression, and, in fact, may be said to have been far more favourably received in foreign countries than in the land of its composer's birth. Two reasons may be assigned for this, the first being that the subject is essentially German, and the second that it is undramatic. M. Massenet was unwise in making what is virtually a four-act opera out of a story that could easily have been treated in one act with two tableaux. The more fact that it took three librettists, M.M. Edouard Blau, Paul Milliet, and Georges Hartmann, to construct an opera book on the basis of Goethe's story shows the difficulty of the task. Yet although the dramatic interest is feeble, and the subject itself rather morbid, it is impossible to be deaf to the sensuous charm of the music. The score glows with colour and freshness in melody and instrumentation, and, as usual with the French composer, the love music is remarkable for sentiment and tenderness. On the other hand, that allotted to the light-hearted Sophie and to the children is in admirable contrast to the strains, now dreamy, now passionate, allotted to Werther and Charlotte. The orchestration is, of course, rich and picturesque, and, speaking generally, if the work possesses all the characteristics of the modern French school, of which Berlioz may be said to have been the founder, M. Massenet owes nothing to any composer in particular. The music is his own, and it stamps him as the greatest living master of his nationality. With the exception of the scenic accessories, which will not compare with those at Vienna, the Covent Garden performance is excellent. M. Jean de Reszke has returned to us in full possession of his lovely voice, Madame Eames renders full justice to the part of Charlotte, and Mlle. Sigrid Arnoldson is charming as Sophie. The minor parts are safe in the hands of M. Albers, M. Castlemary, and Signor De Vaschetti. The orchestra, which is very fine this year, is firmly guided by Signor Mancinelli.

Gounod's once neglected but now immensely popular 'Roméo et Juliette' has seldom been so effectively performed as on Wednesday evening. M. Jean de Reszke was again in superb voice, and although Madame Melba can scarcely be regarded as an ideal Juliet either in appearance or manner, she sang the music to perfection, and all the other parts were well filled. Again the magnificent orchestra acquitted itself extremely well.

M. Saint-Saëns accomplished a heavy task in a thoroughly artistic manner on Thursday last week. At the concert of the Wolff Musical Union at St. James's Hall in the afternoon he took part in his Pianoforte and Violin Sonata, Op. 75, his Pianoforte Trio, Op. 18, and his Pianoforte Quartet in a flat, Op. 41. These well-written works are not unfamiliar to English amateurs, but renewed attention may be drawn to the pearly touch and beautifully finished technique of the French artist and composer. Indeed, many pianists possessing, perhaps, more remarkable executive gifts might take a lesson from the pure style of M. Saint-Saëns. In connexion with this concert attention should be drawn to the solos played in masterly fashion by M. Waefelghem on that difficult but very charming and undeservedly neglected instrument the viola d'amore. Other artists who took effective part in the performance were the concert-giver M. Johannes Wolff, M. Hollmann, and Mr. Eugene Oudin.

M. Saint-Saëns was also the most prominent performer at the Philharmonic Concert on the evening of the same day. We cannot profess much admiration for his so-called Symphony in c minor for orchestra, organ, and pianoforte, the work being pompous and grandiose rather than grand. The score contains, in addition to the usual instruments, an extra flute, corno inglese, bass clarinet, an extra trumpet, contra fagotto, tuba, bass drum, triangle, and cymbals. The work was first performed in London at a Philharmonic Concert on May 19th, 1886, and we felt then constrained to speak of it unfavourably (Athen. No. 3056), and though heard under better conditions last week, with a magnificent organ, at which Mr. W. S. Hoyte presided, and Messrs. Henry Bird and Norman P. Cummings as the pianists, it cannot be said that the work made a more agreeable impression upon the musicians present. Far more pleasant was M. Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto in a minor, frequently played by Señor Sarasate, and interpreted in excellent fashion at the present concert by Mlle. Frida Scotta, her harmonies at the close of the slow movement in the remote key of a flat major being beautifully pure in intonation. Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, Sullivan's denominated 'Di Ballo,' and Beethoven's 'Adelaide,' artistically rendered by Mr. Ben Davies, with Spohr's orchestration, completed the programme.

Musical Society.

We have heard little recently of Mr. Hamish MacCunn. It is, therefore, satisfactory to learn that the talented young Scottish composer has practically finished his opera 'Jeanie Deans,' and that it will positively be produced by the Carl Rosa Company next season. Mr. MacCunn is also said to have written three pieces of a dramatic character for violoncello and pianoforte.

We regret to say that Miss Liza Lehmann will shortly terminate her professional career, in consequence of her approaching marriage, and that her farewell concert is fixed for the afternoon of July 14th, at St. James's Hall.

THE new Leeds College of Music, the initiative of which is largely due to Messrs. Haddock, will be formally opened next Monday by Sir Joseph Barnby, and a series of twelve concerts will follow during the week.

MR. ERNEST FOWLES purposes to give four concerts of instrumental chamber music by English composers, in the most suitable hall in London, during the ensuing autumn. This is an excellent scheme, and should receive the cordial support of amateurs. Further particulars may be gained on application at St. James's Hall, or from any of the leading concert agents.

MR. DAVID BISHAM deserves thanks for commemorating the anniversary of Schumann's birth by a concert at St. James's Hall on Friday afternoon last week. With the valuable assistance of Miss Fanny Davies, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marguerite Hall, and Mr. W. Shakespeare, admirable performances were secured of a large selection of the 'Davidsbündlertänze,' the 'Spanisches Liederspiel,' and no fewer than seventeen songs and duets.

THE final pianoforte recital this season of Josef Hofmann at St. James's Hall, on Saturday last week, was not an unqualified success, the youthful executant being apparently unnerved. His rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in e flat, Op. 31, No. 3, left much to desire, and the same may be said of Chopin's Sonata in a flat minor, the 'Marche Funèbre' being taken at a singularly rapid pace. The best performance was that of some pieces by Rubinstein and Liszt.

THE next pianoforte recital calling for record was that of Madame Sophie Menter at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. The powerful German pianist was heard to advantage in Chopin's Sonata in a minor, and in various smaller pieces by Beethoven, Scarlatti, Schumann, Rubinstein, Sapellnikoff, and Tschalkowsky; but the items by Schubert-Liszt and Wagner-Liszt might well have been spared.

THE second Richter Concert, on Monday evening at St. James's Hall, may be lightly treated, as the programme was of a popular and familiar nature. The Symphony was Schubert's great work in c, No. 9, according to the numbering generally observed in this country, though in Germany it is known as No. 7, the two unfinished works being left out of account. Bizet's first 'L'Arlesienne' Suite; Berlioz's overture, 'Carneval Romain'; and Beethoven's 'Leonora,' No. 3, were the remaining orchestral items, all of which were splendidly interpreted, as were, of course, the Werberlieder, and the Prelied from 'Die Meistersinger,' by Mr. Edward Lloyd.

THE third of the present series of chamber music concerts given by the Musical Guild took place at the Kensington Town Hall on Tuesday evening. The programme included one of Onslow's neglected quintets; Beethoven's Sonata in a, for pianoforte and violoncello, Op. 5, No. 2; and Brahms's Clarinet Trio, Op. 110. Vocal items by Leonevallo and A. Davids were contributed by Mr. John Sandbrook, and the scheme may be generally commended, if only on the avoidance of hackneyed works.

THE concerts of Wednesday afternoon included that of the professional students of the London Academy of Music, several of whom displayed considerable promise; and Master Huberman's third violin recital at the Princes' Hall, at which the very youthful violinist again evinced wonderful talent even in such an exacting work as Beethoven's Concerto, which, however, was an unwise choice, as it loses much with merely a piano accompaniment.

DRORAK's new Pianoforte Trio in a minor, Op. 90, bearing the title of 'Dumky,' which was the principal feature in Mr. Isidor Cohn's concert at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, must be heard again during a less busy time, when it can be fully discussed, for it is a fresh and beautiful work in the composer's most characteristic manner. Mr. Cohn, who is an able pianist, was assisted by Lady Halle and Mr. Whitehouse, and in other portions of his programme by Miss Lydia Müller, Mr. Ries, and Mr. Gibson.

A young Manchester organist, Master Granville Archer Hill, was to make his debut as solo organist and composer at the Crystal Palace yesterday (June 15th). He gained the diploma of Associate of the Royal College of Organists last January at the age of fifteen, and he, together with Mr. T. Sharples, Mus.Bac., are the two youngest organists who have been engaged to play on the large organ at Sydenham.

DRAMA

The Tudor Library. — Narcissus, a Twelfth Night Merriment, 1602. Edited by Margaret L. Lee. (Nutt.)

OUR knowledge of Elizabethan dramatic literature has had some important additions made to it of late years by the publication of pieces hitherto hidden away in MS., and notably by Mr. A. H. Bullen and the Rev. W. D. Macray. Miss Margaret L. Lee, of St. Hugh's Hall, Oxford, now follows suit, and gives us 'A Twelfth Night Merriment,' performed at the College of St. John the Baptist in Oxford, A.D. 1602, which she has discovered in a MS. volume forming part of the Rawlinson collection in the Bodleian Library. This volume is supposed to have been the commonplace book of some Oxford man, and contains, besides the play in question, sundry excerpts from known and unknown authors of the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century. As a specimen, apparently, of the unknown, the editor gives us a piece of four stanzas, entitled 'Of a Gull'; one—according to the heading in the MS.—of certain 'English Epigrammes much like Buckminster's Almanack . . . calculated by John Davis of Grayes Inne . . . 1594.' Of Buckminster and his almanac we confess our ignorance, nor can we guess from this abridgment of the entry in the MS. volume what resemblance there can be between epigrams and almanacs; but surely Sir John Davis's epigrams cannot be unknown at Oxford. They were printed several times, without date, with Marlowe's translations of Ovid's 'Elegies,' and are accessible to all in Dyce's edition of Marlowe's works. This, however, is by the way; 'the play's the thing,' and the piece which Miss Lee has selected for publication, and which from its subject she entitles 'Narcissus,' is certainly not known to exist in any printed form. It is a burlesque of the story as given in the 'Metamorphoses,' following it pretty closely, though, for its greater grace, with some additions. The company being set in hall after supper, the porter of the house craves permission to introduce some "youths of the parish," bearing the wassail-bowl. They enter, and join in a vigorous song in its praise which would have rejoiced the hearts of the Squire of Bracebridge Hall and Master Simon. As they are about to retire the porter insists that they shall afford the company some further entertainment, and they agree to perform a "most con-dolent tragedye," "Ovid's owne Narcissus."

The personages represented are Narcissus; his father and mother, Cephisus and Lyriopo; the blind prophet Tyresias; two youths, Dorastus and Clinias; two damsels, Florida and Clois, or Cloris as she is called in one place; and, of course, Echo. There is also an actor who brings in a bucket of water, some grass, and boughs, which he places on the stage, explaining to the audience that they represent the well in the forest at which Narcissus is to meet his fate. We need not follow the plot of so well known a story; it will suffice to note that one of its embellishments is a hunting scene, another the addition of some scenes in which the youthful friends Dorastus and Clinias are set at enmity by Echo. At the end of the play the porter who has introduced the players performs the part of Epilogue, and incidentally mentions that his name is Frances.

Following up this clue, Miss Lee labours to prove, and we think with success, that the porter was Francis Clark, who was appointed to the office of "janitor" on May 8th, 1601. She gives in an appendix, as evidence in support of her argument, three speeches and a letter composed for this person, also contained in the MS. volume; they show him to have been a confident and humorous personage much like the porter in the induction and epilogue of the play.

In some coincidences of expression in the play itself Miss Lee finds traces of Shakespearean influence, and may possibly be right. These coincidences are confined to Shakespeare's 'Henry IV.'; but she also considers that the "well," because it is included in the list of "Interloquutores," therefore presents an instance of inanimate objects being represented by living actors parallel with that afforded by "Wall" and "Moonshine" in the immortal 'Pyramus and Thisby,' played by Peter Quince's company before Duke Theseus. Here, we think, she is clearly wrong. In the 'Narcissus' the "well," i.e., the bucket, &c., is merely a piece of movable scenery; "Wall" and "Moonshine," on the other hand, do actually walk and talk. Narcissus and Echo at the end of the play might better have been compared with them: for the one then represents a flower, the other a stone or rock. Another incident in 'Narcissus' might also be adduced as suggesting the influence of 'Midsummer Night's Dream': we allude to the scenes in which Dorastus and Clinias are deceived and set at enmity by Echo; one can hardly read these scenes without being reminded of Demetrius and Lysander, alternately provoked by Puck.

As an illustration of what may be called the hunting scene in 'Narcissus' we may call attention to the fact that a play on the same subject was "showned on Twelwe dayes at nighte by the Children of the Chappell" before Queen Elizabeth in 1571. No line of this play has come down to us, but the Accounts of the Revels at Court, first brought to light by Malone (see Malone's 'Shakespeare' by Boswell, 1821, iii. 365, 369), show that it also contained a hunting scene, managed apparently on a like plan, though with far greater elaboration. The entry is curious and worth extracting:—

"John Tryce for money to him due for Leashes, and dog-bookes with staves, and other necessities by him provided, for the hunters that made the crye after the fox (let loose in the coorte) with their hownde, hornes, and hallowing, in the play of Narcissus, which crye was made of purpose even as the words then in utterance, and the parte then played, did Requier," &c.

Tryce got 21s. 8d. for his services. A second entry shows that a sum of 22s. was paid to John Isard "for his device in counterfeting Thunder and Lightning in the play of Narcissus."

It is the "hardye hare" which is the subject of the chase in the play we have under review, and there is no thunder and lightning in it. This thunder and lightning suggests that the Revels' play was a serious one, or at least intended to be so. Can the St. John's play have been a burlesque of it? This, of course, must remain a mere matter of conjecture; but in any case Miss Lee deserves the thanks of all students of the Elizabethan drama for having given us an interesting and amusing little piece; her work on it is excellently well done. We think, however, we detect one oversight in it. The play is printed verbatim et literatim, except that some contractions have been expanded, but the pointing professes to have been revised throughout. In l. 561 we read, "Jove helpes then if wee fight": surely it should be "helpe's"—help us. In l. 466 "grammer," we presume, is a misprint; had it been an error of the MS., it would have been noted; obviously, the word should be grammar. Paper and print are all that can be desired in the production of a beautiful book.

Dramatic Gossip.

We know not if 'The Blackmailers' of Messrs. John Gray and André Raffalovich, which saw the light at an afternoon representation last week at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, is to be accepted as typical of the new drama. It is at least pessimistic enough to have taken its rise in Scandinavia, and amorphous enough to mark a new departure in effort. An inn is said to exist with the unpromising title of "Five Miles from Anywhere." A title somewhat similar seems due to a piece such as this, which is like nothing in the world, and is scarcely inchoate. The one notion by which the characters are possessed is that they require more luxuries than they can command, and that to the need for these things all moral and social obligations and responsibilities give way. Chantage seems the most promising method of obtaining what is sought, and to this they accordingly resort. What is the secret that enables an expert in crime to make youth of good family discharge for him offences worse than mental it would be superfluous, and perhaps inexpedient, to inquire. During three acts various more or less leprous persons exhibit their nudity, and then all, with one exception, disappear. A new set of characters then appears, for the sake of sitting in judgment upon one of the delinquents, who takes to flight, and the establishing nothing, exhibiting nothing, and being nothing comes to an end. Miss Olga Brandon all but interested the audience in the fortunes of a guilty woman who is the victim of the blackmailers. So soon, however, as she had raised a faint flutter of expectation she disappeared, to be heard of no more.

The circular addressed to the managers of music-halls by the Licensor of Plays, to which we referred last week, has been withdrawn. But the managers of the halls have drafted a Bill, to be presented to Parliament next session, proposing to remove the restrictions which now prevent the acting of "stage plays" in unlicensed buildings, and this will include a clause compelling all sketches to be submitted to the Licensor.

The performance at the Haymarket of 'A Modern Eve' has been postponed to July 2nd.

Mr. HENRY IRVING has bought both the English and American rights of 'Journeys End in Lovers' Meetings,' the proverb by Mrs. Craigie and Mr. George Moore, which was so favourably received at Daly's Theatre a few days ago. The same writers have a new play nearly ready, and Mrs. Craigie has completed one in which she has had no collaborator.

'THE JERRY BUILDER,' a three-act farcical comedy by Messrs. Mark Melford and William Miller, first produced at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, Southampton, on June 13th, 1892, was produced on Monday at the Grand Theatre, Islington, by Mr. Edouin. It will be transferred to the Strand on Monday.

AMONG recent engagements for the coming season at Drury Lane are Miss Beatrice Lamb and Mr. Arthur Bouchier.

'A FAMILY MATTER,' by Messrs. C. G. Compton and A. G. Hockley, is to be produced at the Garrick on the morning of the 27th. Misses Mary Rorke, Ellis Jeffreys, and Winifred Fraser, and Messrs. Bucklaw and Charles Groves will take part in the representation.

FOR the next season of the Independent Theatre Mr. Grein promises Gerhart Hauptmann's 'Lonely Souls,' and new plays by Mrs. Oscar Reinger, Mr. E. F. Spence, and Mr. Bernard Shaw.

SIGNORA DUSE has departed, and has not obliged her admirers with a single novelty. It is an indefeasible privilege of womanhood to be obstinate, and were it otherwise none would be so ungracious as to refuse it to so delightful a representative of her sex. The success of the artist has, however, been impaired by the rigorously limited répertoire. Ignorance of Italian is another cause why her reception has been literary rather than popular.

It is curious, and on the whole satisfactory, that M. Mounet Sully comes as far short of satisfying an American as an English public. The French have failed to discover what a less quick-witted race have long seen, that "sound and fury" are wholly antagonistic to tragedy. They will have to take a further lesson from our book or forfeit their pre-eminence in matters theatrical.

A DUOLOGUE by Mr. E. H. Whitmore was given at the Criterion Theatre on Thursday afternoon, the exponents being Miss Irene Vanbrugh and Mr. Bouchier.

EPPS'S COCAINE,
COCOA-NIB EXTRACT (TRADE-MARK).

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their essence of oil, leaving for use a finely flavored powder—"COCAINE," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistency of cream, of which it is now beneficially taking the place with many. Its active principle, being a gentle nerve-stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in Packets and Tins, labelled "JAMES EPPS & CO. THE KING OF SCHNORRERS.

With 16 Illustrations by Phil May and others.

"A very fascinating story. Mr. Zangwill returns to the Ghetto, and by treating it as it was towards the close of the eighteenth century, gives us a quaint old-world picture as a most appropriate setting for his picturesque hero, the Peggler King."—St. James's Gazette.

CHILDREN OF THE GHETTO.

"This book is admirable throughout, the theme is original, the treatment no less so. Often a work is saved by possessing one of these two qualities—Mr. Zangwill possesses both."—Daily News.

THE PREMIER AND THE PAINTER.

By I. ZANGWILL and LOUIS COWEN.

"It is to the sort of book that demands yet does quotation for one thing, and for another it is the sort of book the description of which as 'very clever' is at once laudable and inadvisable. In some respects it is original enough to be a law unto itself."—Athenæum.

THE OLD MAID'S CLUB.

"Most strongly to be recommended to all classes of readers."—Athenæum.

A SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.

A New Edition. Crown 8vo. price 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"A novel upon which has been expended an infinity of thought, and the pages of which betray a capacity for the analysis of human feelings and emotions rarely met with."

Standard.—"A love story that is a very remarkable piece of writing, told with real power and beauty. The author is full of undisciplined power, she has poetry and passion and courage and, values we are mistaken, has a future before her. The last two or three pages of her book lift it into a poem."

Review of Reviews.—"The anonymous author presents original passion, unremembered of the tangle of shame and habit with a simplicity and directness unequalled in recent English fiction. In short 'A Superfluous Woman' is a clever book and a useful. Whether it will attain the success of The Heavenly Twins is yet to be seen, but the good that it will do will be much on the same lines."

Edinburgh Gazette.—"There is much strong and some pathetic writing in 'A Superfluous Woman,' and we dare say it will be pronounced a remarkable book."

THE STORY OF A MODERN WOMAN.

By ELLA HEPPWORTH DIXON.

Crown 8vo. price 6s.

Andrew.—"We use who reads 'The Story of a Modern Woman' will be likely to praise the excellence of its writing and the genuine talent shown by Miss Dixon. Altogether it seems to me one of the best written books that have appeared of late, whether by writers of the larger latitude, or otherwise. It shows altogether exceptional promise, and is written with reserve, dignity, grace, sobriety, and power. The two closing chapters have that largeness, wholeness, we may say, of touch, of atmosphere, which we find in the masters only."

Review Weekly.—"This is a touching and sincere book, its value lies in its reality. It is marked by genuine ability and earnestness. In a word, a book to be read, and to enjoy."

Graphic.—"Miss Ella Heppworth Dixon has inherited no small share of her father's literary gifts, and she adds to it a faculty of observation and a constructive and narrative skill which are of considerable promise. As to the story itself, Miss Dixon is to be commended for having given a delightful touch of novelty to her treatment of the subject."

By HAROLD FREDERIC.

Crown 8vo. uniform binding, 3s. 6d. each.

THE COPPERHEAD. Stories of the North during the American War

"The author of 'The Copperhead' will prove an undoubted rival to Bret Harto in depicting the quaint and rugged aspects of American life in the remote districts. The scene of the stories is laid in the North during the Civil War. An exceedingly readable volume."—Guardian.

IN THE VALLEY. Illustrated.

"A romantic story, both graphic and exciting, not merely in the central picture itself, but also in its weird surroundings. This is a novel deserving to be read."—Athenæum.

THE RETURN OF THE O'MAHONY.

Illustrated.

"That Mr. Harold Frederic is a very admirable writer has been known for some time, but 'The Return of the O'Mahony' comes as a surprise. It is full of fun of the good old-fashioned order, and here and there comes a chapter of stirring action to give us a respite from laughter."—Andrew.

By Mrs. HUNGERFORD.

Crown 8vo. uniform binding, 3s. 6d. each.

THE HOYDEN.

"This is too good a book to discuss with conventional words of praise. The plot is well constructed and interesting, and the stage is not too crowded with actors."—Family Fan.

NOR WIFE NOR MAID.

"It may be safely affirmed that Mrs. Hungerford's admirers—and they are numerously important—will not be the least disappointed with her new story. It has all the characteristics of this writer's work, and greater emotional depth than most of its predecessors."—Queen.

THE O'CONNORS OF BALLINAHINCH.

[Six Shillings.

"The love exemplars of the three Miss O'Connors make delightful reading, and there is no padding to dilute the genuine and wholesome wit to be found in almost every page."—Daily Telegraph.

By ADA CAMBRIDGE.

Crown 8vo. uniform binding, 3s. 6d. each.

NOT ALL IN VAIN.

"The novel has strength and excitement as well as the glamour romance."—Athenæum.

THE THREE MISS KINGS.

"Miss Cambridge's sketches of colonial society are amusing, while the love stories of two of the heroines are told with feeling and grace."—Morning Post.

A MARKED MAN.

"Its tone is healthy and breezy, its natural descriptions charming, its dramatic personae native and real, and its plot sufficiently marked to be surprising."—Graphic London.

FIFTY YEARS of MY LIFE

In the WORLD of SPORT at HOME and ABROAD. By SIR JOHN DUGDALE ASTLEY, Bart.

"It is not too much to say that in writing these two volumes, which he has by permission dedicated to the Prince of Wales, Sir John Astley has not only produced a book which will amuse and in some measure instruct the thousands who will be anxious to read it, but has at once taken his place amongst the best chroniclers of his time."—Times, May 18.

"In conclusion we never read a book into the treasures and attractions of which it is more impossible to give an insight by a few quotations. It is the work of a thoroughly genial and good fellow, who has seen nearly every vicissitude of life, and the open air on which, and has touched nothing without adorning it."—Daily Telegraph.

ATHENÆUM.—"We tender our sincere thanks to Mr. Kipling for the hour of pure and unadulterated enjoyment which he has given us, and many another reader, by this inimitable 'Jungle Book'."

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"In this latest evidence of the versatility of his talent, Mr. Kipling shows us once more how close an observer he is, how little escapes his attention when once he rivets it upon an object, and with what brilliant intuition he creates a plausible and coherent impression."

PUNCH.—"Ken's Fables and dear old Brer Rabbit, Brer Fox & Co., observe The Baron sagely, may have suggested to the fanciful genius of Rudyard Kipling the delightful idea, carried out in the most fascinating style, of The Jungle Book."

A MODERN BUCCANEER. By Rolf BOLDREWOOD. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"We do not forget 'Robbery under Arms,' or any of its various successors, when we say that Rolf Boldrewood has never done anything so good as 'A Modern Buccaneer.' It is good, too, in a manner which is for the author a new one."

SPEAKER.—"Mr. Boldrewood possesses something of the secret of Defoe. He tells his tale with so much precision and so much detail that he compels the reader to accept it."

The ELEMENTS of METAPHYSICS. By Prof. PAUL DUBOIS. Translated by C. M. DUFF. Crown 8vo. 6s.

DAILY NEWS.—"It presents in a convenient form a clear analysis, to one who has thoroughly mastered it, of the philosophic system which has supplanted that of Hegel, and which is at the present time the dominant one in Germany. Dr. Deussen is, moreover, well read in Oriental literature, and his comparisons between the metaphysics of the East and West are curious and instructive."

LITERATURE

The British Mission to Uganda in 1893. By the late Sir Gerald Portal, K.C.M.G., C.B. Edited with a Memoir by Rennell Rodd, C.M.G. With the Diary of the late Capt. Raymond Portal and an Introduction by Lord Cromer, G.C.M.G. (Arnold.)

THE diaries of Sir Gerald Portal will be widely read, but do not add much to our knowledge of Uganda, although the photographs by Col. Rhodes, from which the book is illustrated, are singularly interesting. It was right that this work should be published, if only as a memorial of the brilliant young diplomatist who was the author of the greater part of it. Gerald Portal was an excellent specimen of an Etonian: a popular athlete, rider, and shot, who played for the school eleven, although not in the years "1886 and 1887," as stated in the memoir. In those years he was at work in a very different field. Those who dislike examinations will make use of the fact that he failed to obtain his entrance at Oxford from being unable to pass the matriculation examination of a college; but they must also bear in mind the fact that he was able shortly afterwards to successfully compete by examination for the diplomatic service. Possibly the requirement of income from the candidates in the latter case restricts the competition. Gerald Portal was certainly an honour to the diplomatic service, which has in it too few men of equal distinction, and could ill afford the loss which it sustained by his early death.

In the introduction his friend Lord Cromer, under whom he had long served at Cairo, says:—

"The deadly African climate proved fatal to his gallant brother, who accompanied him, and ultimately to himself, for I conceive that his constitution was undermined by fever and by the fatigues which he underwent in his Uganda journey."

Portal speaks of himself as having been, in common with the other Europeans who accompanied him to Uganda, "pulled down by fever," and the photograph of him as he appeared at Kikuyu shows him worn almost to the bone.

The greater part of the volume is concerned with the march up, as when Portal was writing his report for the Government he was too busy to write much privately on his impressions, and his diary of the time is given in small type. The road up comes out badly in this book. He repeatedly speaks of the greater part of the districts through which the road passes being "absolutely foodless"; and there is one entirely waterless and desert tract, thirty-seven miles wide, which acts as a deterrent upon travel to the caravans, necessarily heavily loaded, and which sometimes becomes forty-eight miles by the drying of a single pool—forty-eight miles to be traversed at a single march. The result is that the road to Uganda through the German sphere of influence is preferred by all.

The British East Africa Company appear from Sir Gerald Portal's book to have opened a 24-inch tramway from the coast "with great ceremony under the name of the 'Central African Railway';" but it is complete for seven miles only, although since its hasty abandonment "rails, bolts, sleepers, screws and nuts, sufficient for some seventy or eighty miles of line, lie in stacks and heaps near the beach of the harbour." Sir Gerald Portal writes: "Not a living soul, until ourselves, had ever made use of the line for any practical purpose, and the whole work remains as a monument to good intentions overpowered by force of circumstances."

The country about Kikuyu is evidently such as may one day be utilized for European settlement, although it is probable that healthy white children cannot be reared there, in spite of the elevation, as it is under the equator. For the present, however, the natives have been so badly treated as to have been driven into an attitude of fierce hostility, which only increases the natural difficulties of the road. Sir Gerald Portal frequently points out how great has been the hypocrisy of the European powers in reference to their dealings with the natives of Africa. For example, the traders have flooded Africa with a cheap pernicious spirit under the name of "Eau de Cologne," which is not entered in the trade reports as spirits, but in many cases as "perfume." He tells us of being assured "by an African traveller of great renown that the only way in which to deal with the Kikuyu people, whether singly or in masses, was 'to shoot at sight.'" Sir Gerald Portal himself writes:—

"It is to be greatly feared that the breech-loader and the repeating rifles of the European officer and his half-disciplined troops are still emptied far too often in the cause of civilization, and that the fire in which the African now finds himself is not much more comfortable than his former passive position in the frying-pan."

Although he does not entirely credit the stories told him by the natives, he says:—

"We were the recipients of a string of bitter complaints against caravans which had previously passed along this road, and long stories were told us of burnt villages, looted cattle, and of volleys poured into flying crowds."

When once matters have come into this condition it is, as Queensland colonists well know, not easy to set them right. Raids take place until the Europeans, who are supposed to be in occupation of the country, turn upon the natives and attack them. For example, Sir Gerald Portal says that in Kavirondo

"a certain local chief, who had acquired rather more power than his neighbours, had been in the habit of raiding all over this country, till it was more than half ruined, and that then a 'punitive' expedition of the Imperial British East Africa Company, directed against this chief, had overrun the district, and completed its desolation."

In the mean time not only spirits, but gunpowder, are plentifully introduced:—

"All, I noticed, had well-filled cartridge-belts round their waists. In my innocence, as I thought of all the thunders of the General Act of the Brussels Conference, and all the ordinances, enactments, and regulations which had been published thereafter by different Powers having possessions on the African coast, I wondered how, in the very centre of Africa, these people were enabled to keep their belts so well replenished with cartridges of different and of the most modern patterns. I had not been a month in the country before I had learnt that, for those who had the wherewithal to trade, guns, powder, lead, and all the instruments of destruction thereunto appertaining, could be as easily purchased in Uganda as in Pall Mall."

Sir Gerald Portal formed the same unpleasant impression of the representatives of both sides of the religious world in Uganda as that which we noticed as being Capt. Lugard's when we reviewed his work. When the bishops met in his presence Portal described the atmosphere as "electric," and wrote in a letter to his mother:—

"All's well that ends well, but I don't wish ever again to have a three and a half hours' skirmish with two angry bishops—one not understanding English, and the other knowing no French. The whole history of Uganda for the last ten years is more worthy the Middle Ages, or the days of the Edict of Nantes, than the end of the nineteenth century; but I don't think either side is more to blame than the other."

The policy which at one time prevailed of mapping out mission countries between the contending European parties was, perhaps, a wise one, and certainly the results which have followed their coming into collision in Uganda have been most discreditable to all concerned.

Social Evolution. By Benjamin Kidd. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. KIDD, we should imagine, is a self-taught man. His learning is superficial and his quotations mostly from magazines. With additional quotations his readers could very well dispense; it is a more considerable fault that in a spirit of light-hearted dogmatism our author puts aside whole schools of philosophers without any serious attempt to expound or estimate their position, and settles the worth and function of our reason with a carelessness to justify himself which smacks rather of the provincial pulpit than of the teacher's chair. And yet we cannot help being both entertained and instructed by him. He has the virtues (and they are not few) of his deficiencies. One-sided and uncritical as he is apt to be, he has thought seriously, boldly, and consecutively. His grasp of the principle of biological evolution is firm and sure; his confidence in applying it to unlock the puzzles of history and the mysteries of the future is fascinating. He has the independent attitude of a man conscious that thought and study have given him the right to speak as a teacher—at least, amongst those who share his fundamental doctrine: the authority neither of a Huxley nor a Spencer can overawe him. That his views are less absolutely novel than the absence of references would lead one to suppose he would probably be himself ready to admit. But even what is old has here, we allow, a new setting, and the book contains ingenious speculations which we believe to be genuinely original.

Gibbon tells us in a well-known sentence that the numerous religions that could boast followers in the Roman empire were regarded by the multitude as equally true, by the philosopher as equally false, by the magistrate as equally useful. Gallio, according to this description of his class, would have thought Mr. Kidd a most sensible person, though prone to make needlessly lengthy appeals to history and to wrap plain truths in obscure language. Gallio, as a rule, has been denounced by ardent but narrow believers; but the religious bodies are, as Mr. Kidd observes, showing a tendency to close up into a single phalanx, and they will possibly be glad to accept him as their champion. He will readily accept the function, if offered on his own terms. He must not be asked to prove the truth of any religion or of the common basis—for he admits such a common basis—of all religions. He apparently does not regard any of them or their common element as susceptible of proof; or rather he allows, if we understand him rightly, that an investigation of their history and written credentials suggests, though it cannot prove, that they are false. But, true or false, history, he thinks, shows that belief in them is necessary to social progress. They are to him the one possible source of all unselfish, disinterested, altruistic energy—as was, indeed, previously sought to be demonstrated, at least for primitive societies, in that famous book, the Cité Antique of M. Fustel de Coulanges. To Mr. Kidd the view seems proved for all ages by the general existence of religions in the sense of codes with supernatural sanctions, and by the perpetual and seemingly inevitable resurgence of religion in the race when it had come to seem wholly discredited. That civilization cannot stand for one generation, much less be propagated into another, without much self-denial is obvious; nor is it less obvious that religious belief has been a very potent force in originating such self-denial. What will appear to many more disputable is that religious belief is needed to combat not merely man's animal impulses, but even his much-vaunted reason. Mr. Kidd is strongly of opinion, though he offers marvellously little proof, that reason is essentially individualistic and disintegrating. A rationalistic age is to him necessarily an anti-social age, and on the way to become, even if at first it is not, an immoral age—an age therefore of social decadence, weakness, and degeneration. He therefore broadly pronounces rational religion or rational morality a contradiction in terms. All systems of moral philosophy are thus involved in one indiscriminating condemnation. We think that even those in substantial agreement with him may here demur to his narrowness. It is surely not incorrect to consider our reason precisely as our power to view things from a universal, not an individual standpoint. Science does this with regard to nature. Is not a being who is capable of science capable also of regarding human happiness in a similarly impersonal way? Mr. Kidd may, perhaps, say he is capable of so regarding it, but not capable of so caring for it. But, if this last statement is broadly true (and we are not at present concerned to deny it), would it not be better expressed by denying that reason is effective when opposed to desire than by identifying reason with desire and denouncing it as wholly selfish? And perhaps, after all, in a few men and in a certain measure, there is a passion for reason; such men, if we offered them Prof. Sidgwick's famous alternatives "absurdity or unhappiness," would choose the latter. Let us, however, neglect this small minority and allow that the selfish instinct is not likely to be conquered except by altruistic instinct or sentiment; still it is certainly not clear that selfish instinct better deserves to be dignified with the name of reason than its opposite. A moral philosopher does not seem to us to be aiming at an end necessarily futile when he seeks to prove that the moral code is the realization of reason; of course he must not be understood to say that conscious reason discovered it, much less that it brought it into operation and gave it binding force over men. Very likely this was done, and could only be done, by religion, though we must own that even this point is far from clear to us. What, we are inclined to ask, produced religion? Not surely in all cases, if in any, direct revelation from heaven. Then how comes human nature so thoroughly and submissively to accept it? Mr. Kidd is indignant with some writers of his own school for "the triviality and comparative insignificance of the explanations offered to account for the development of such an imposing class of social phenomena" as religions. His indignation is, on his own principles, misdirected. The origin of religion, we should have thought, ought to be indifferent to him, just as much as that of any other of those "accidental variations" which, according to the Darwinian theory, have made such a profound difference in the history of the animal world. Not the origin of religions, but their social value, is the only thing in them which we should expect Mr. Kidd to care for. If this latter is under-estimated, as it no doubt ludicrously is when Mr. Grant Allen applies the absurd and offensive phrase "a grotesque fungoid growth" to "a characteristic feature in the higher religions," Mr. Kidd may naturally feel it his duty to protest. But how this "feature" came to be conceived and attached to religion seems to us to be no concern of his. If it can be proved a priori, as he thinks, that religious beliefs cannot possibly have their root in reason, then it would seem that their origin, if discoverable, must necessarily seem to us, as reasonable beings, fantastic and absurd.

Now this opposition of religion to reason fills a very large space in Mr. Kidd's book. It comes in both early and late; or, rather, even in the beginning it is less emphatically dwelt on than near the end of his volume, where, his exposition of the past and his prophecy of the future having been completed, he adds a special chapter (ch. ix.) to show that "human progress is not primarily intellectual." Have we not reason, he asks, to conclude that the ancient Greeks stood intellectually far higher than ourselves, as much higher—so Mr. Galton thinks—as we are higher than the African negro? He points out, with justice, that because we do not fall into Greek errors, because we can perform mental operations to which they were unequal, that by no means proves us to possess a keener natural faculty; we have a store of knowledge and intellectual machinery by which our minds may work both more surely and more quickly than theirs. We do not deny this; but we cannot allow that intellectual progress can only be viewed as heightening of natural faculty. Deeper insight may belong to the less talented race if it has accumulated better weapons with which to storm the strongholds of nature, if it works more continuously, the members of each generation co-operating with one another and continuing the work of past generations in a way unknown to the talented Greeks, each with a novel and comprehensive theory of his own, and with a range of experience of nature, the individual, and society infinitely more limited than ours. Mr. Kidd should therefore have proved, not that our intellectual leaders have less natural acuteness than eminent Greeks, or our average men less natural intelligence in following them, but that the insight of our leaders and our generation at large is less profound than that of the Greeks. But this he has not attempted to demonstrate. He asserts, and probably correctly, that our clearest innate advantage over the Greeks is in our social and moral qualities. The average Englishman is, it may be, to use Mr. Leslie Stephen's phrase, better "social tissue" than the ancient Greek. But moral superiority may also have intellectual results. The race that is better organized for one form of force is, unless it deliberately narrows itself, better organized for all. Mr. Kidd grants the superiority of modern civilization in the quality of perseverance. Is it not likely that those who can persevere and can co-operate will be in the end wiser than a nation of acute and unconnected speculators, brilliant in guessing, but tardy at verification and correction from experience? On these then and similar grounds we are unable to accept Mr. Kidd's absolute disjunction of reason from religion and social progress. Man is indeed divided against himself, but the combatants are not those pictured by Mr. Kidd in a truly impressive passage, a favourable yet fair specimen of his style:—

"The one fact which stands out clear above it all is that the forces against which man is engaged throughout the whole course of the resulting struggle are none other than those enlisted against him by his reason. As in Calderon's tragic story the unknown figure which throughout life is everywhere in conflict with the individual whom it haunts lifts the mask at last to disclose to the opponent his own features, so here underneath these religious phenomena we see man throughout his career engaged in a remorseless and relentless struggle in which the opponent proves to be none other than his own reason. Throughout all the centuries in which history has him in view we witness him driven by a profound instinct which finds its expression in his religious unmistakably recognizing a hostile force of some kind in his own reason."

There is, in fact, according to Mr. Kidd, "an old battle," not between philosophy and poetry as in Plato, but between religion and reason; and by an inevitable necessity religion can see in reason nothing but sin and presumption to be suppressed by scaffolds and autos da fe, while reason has seen in religion nothing but fantastic illusion and ignorant oppression. Such a picture may be plausibly confirmed by many a passage of history: yet perhaps, after all, reason only comes to be viewed as the enemy of religion because it seeks to reform it and raise it to higher levels, to detach from it irrelevant superstitions. Nor is it in every age that the two have been in opposition, but only in those when religion has become degraded, and reason has rightly become critical and censorious towards it.

With the above reservations we entirely admit Mr. Kidd's thesis of the immense importance of religion to human progress, and we deprecate with him the shallowness, unworthy of men of science, specially unworthy of evolutionists, with which so many have derided the more superstitious of religions or sought to pull down the whole structure as unprovable by any finite tests. But views like these are by no means his peculiar discovery. A more original point is the contrast he draws between the history of Christianity before and since the Renaissance and the Reformation. In the fourteen or fifteen centuries prior to those epochs he holds the work of Christianity was to form a new type of human character, or, rather, to re-form at a higher level an old but decayed type. The altruism—narrow, but strong and genuine within its limits—of the ancient world had gone hopelessly to ruin under the assaults of reason, so Mr. Kidd thinks. Earliest in the Greek world, later in the Roman, men had ceased to throw themselves with energy into the work of the world; they avoided responsibilities and uncertainties, they took thought for their own interests alone, they checked the reproductive instinct. Split into spiritless and selfish units, the imposing Roman empire had become so weak as to be an open prey to every invader. Christianity re-created manliness, disregard of self, regard for others. When the new type of character was fully formed—when it had abolished, at least in great part, slavery and serfdom, and carried deep into human consciousness the conviction that all men are equal before God—it flung itself with fresh vigour into practical life. It has protested against suffering, against the domination of class over class, against the privileges first of nobility, then of wealth, against the enslavement of the African, against the degradation of the proletariat. And here Mr. Kidd finds the next development of humanity, the work of the twentieth century. The Socialists, he contends, though utterly wrong in their practical programme, have truly seen that hereditary feudal privilege has decayed only to be supplanted by another system of privilege, hardly less exclusive and odious, and far more degrading—that of wealth. It is true that wealth seems open for every one to acquire; but it is not really open.

"To him that hath shall be given." Wealth is the first instrument for procuring further wealth; poverty closes the avenues by which mental powers can be trained or exercised. We have not really given equal opportunities to all. We must not merely give to all rudimentary education, but to those who are fitted for it such higher education as their faculties are able to appropriate and use. We must stop by graduated income tax and death duties the huge accumulation of wealth in individual hands which gives its possessors the power to crush competition. We must tie their hands, if possible, that they may not further enrich themselves by the speculative tricks of the corn and cotton exchanges (of late so bitterly complained of here and in America), to the disorganization of legitimate trade, which should, if possible, bring supply at the lowest possible rates where there is genuine demand. Everywhere men have been made politically free; they must now be made socially free, that each may turn his hand towards what he is fittest for, and not be oppressed by the sense that he is always working for others, not for himself. And as the demand for political freedom won its battle by the prevalence of the altruistic instinct, which the Christian spirit has enormously strengthened, so effectiveness and ultimate victory are certain through great and, perhaps, revolutionary changes for the new demand. And thus the religious spirit will be, as it has always been, the greatest promoter of social progress; for the most efficient society is that in which liberty of individual enterprise is most complete, since competition and rivalry are the source of progress in the human as in the animal species.

We have done our best to represent the main positive thought of Mr. Kidd. Whether it will ultimately be found acceptable we cannot presume to judge. Suggestive as it is (and in some respects we have from want of space done less than justice to it), we cannot at present feel sure that it is self-consistent. It must be clearly understood that Mr. Kidd writes neither as a Socialist nor as a Christian, but as an evolutionist. What, he asks, is the tendency, what the forces, of evolution? What tends to promote continued and more vigorous existence? What tends to weaken, degrade, and dissolve it? He does not agree with Mr. Spencer that we are slowly tending to a harmony of the selfish and social instinct by the formation of a character in which, to use Bentham's phrase, "selfishness takes the form of benevolence." This result, he thinks, can only appear possible to those who hold that heredity "the inheritance of acquired characters"; but we must confess that for our part we have found here no proof of this. On the other hand, Mr. Kidd is at variance with the Socialist ideal, which, with its extinction of rivalry, seems to him to lead, by biological laws of universal validity, to a degeneration in the type of human existence; and which he identifies, as others have done, with individualism, a low rational calculation of the least arduous way in which each man's sensuous wants may be satisfied. Not to extinguish competition, but to extend its range, while equalizing its conditions, is his ideal. It will not to most of us seem the consummation of bliss. But this is a consideration of that mean and selfish reason which, our author tells us, is ever driving the race to commit suicide. Our last word should be—work, and the opportunity of work, for all.

The Autobiography of Theobald Wolfe Tone, 1763-1798. Edited with an Introduction by R. Barry O'Brien. 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS work appears at an appropriate time. It cannot be said, however, to appear in an appropriate form. Who, out of Brobdingnag, can comfortably read a volume weighing several pounds? The two exceed half a stone.

Mr. Barry O'Brien, who has edited it and written an introduction, may be as good a patriot as Wolfe Tone, but he is sadly deficient in critical taste and judgement. He has furnished a condensed summary of Wolfe Tone's life; he has omitted his political writings and an instructive preface to the American edition, and yet he has reprinted many pages which are utterly worthless. The contents of chapters iv. and v. might have been summarized in a few sentences. Indeed, the work does not interest the reader or possess much value for the historian till after Wolfe Tone has reached America and has passed from America to France. When he was in France his wife and children were in America, and his diary was kept for the information of his wife, to whom he was devotedly attached. He was a doting husband and a fond father, and, if uxoriousness could excuse his faults, he could plead it with as great effect as Charles I.

He hoped that the desire of his heart might be achieved with the aid of French arms. As he states at the beginning of the third chapter of the first volume, "to subvert the tyranny of our execrable Government, to break the connexion with England, the never-failing source of all our political evils, and to assert the independence of my country—these were my objects. To unite the whole people of Ireland, to abolish the memory of all past dissensions, and to substitute the common name of Irishman in place of the denominations of Protestant, Catholic, and Dissenter—these were my means."

The Society of United Irishmen had been formed, yet the something more which was requisite to achieve the object of his dreams could only, as he thought, be supplied by France, and his utmost efforts were directed towards obtaining from France the aid which he considered indispensable. The Duke of Wellington was right in styling Wolfe Tone "a most extraordinary man." He arrived in France with a hundred guineas in his pocket; he could not speak the language of the country; he carried letters of introduction which did not avail much; and yet by sheer force of audacity and perseverance he persuaded the rulers of France to fit out an expedition for severing Ireland from the United Kingdom, consisting of forty-three sail and an army of fifteen thousand men. Its failure was wormwood to Wolfe Tone, yet he did not despair, and never relaxed his efforts till a second expedition was dispatched, which failed also, and led to the forfeiture of his life.

It is worthy of note how much he owed to the protection of the United States. He journeyed to Paris with a false passport under the name of James Smith. Mr. James Monroe, the American Minister at Paris, afforded him all the help in his power; and when Tone had to give Carnot a reference as to character, he mentioned Mr. Monroe as a gentleman who would vouch for him. If Tone's object had been attained, the representative of the United States might have taken a part of the credit or been liable to the burden of shame for aiding in the attack upon a friendly power. But these things are matters of indifference now.

It is as a man of letters that we prefer to contemplate Wolfe Tone, and all that proceeded from his pen displays a power which, if properly directed, would have made his name worthy of lasting honour. He possessed a fair knowledge of the classics, and the best works in English literature were engraven on his memory. He intersperses his autobiography with quotations which are at once apt and spontaneous. They flowed from his pen and they were not meant for display. Moreover, he writes with precision and point the tongue of the country which he desired to annihilate. Some of his remarks are as acute as they are well put. Let the following suffice for one example; it was written in Paris in 1796:—

"Went to see 'Othello'; not translated, but only taken from the English. Poor Shakespeare! I felt for him. The French tragedy is a pitiful performance, filled with false sentiment; the Moor whines most abominably, and Iago is a person of a very pretty morality; the author apologises for softening the villainy of the latter character, as well as for saving Desdemona, and substituting a happy termination in place of the sublime and terrible conclusion of the English tragedy, by saying that the humanity of the French nation, and their morality would be shocked by such exhibitions: 'Marry come up, indeed! People's ears are sometimes the nicest part about them.' I admire a nation that will guillotine sixty people a day for months, men, women, and children, and cannot bear the catastrophe of a dramatic exhibition! Yet, certainly the author knows best, and I have had occasion repeatedly to observe, that the French are more struck with any little incident of tenderness on the stage, a thousand times, than the English, which is strange. In short, the French are a humane people when they are not mad, and I like them with all their faults, and the guillotine at the head of them, better, a thousand times, than the English. And I like the Irish better than either, and as no one can doubt my impartiality, I expect my opinion will be received with proper respect and deference by all whom it may concern."

No reader will require to have it pointed out, we should hope, that the last words, like many others in these volumes, are obviously written in a spirit of exaggeration or fun. The humour which abounds in Wolfe Tone's pages not only enlivens them, but endears the writer to his readers. He wrote, let it be remembered, for his wife alone, and this fact ensures the sincerity of his narrative. Before passing on, we may note that he makes another reference to Shakespeare, as deserving of attention as that which has been reproduced. At p. 171 in the second volume he writes:—

"We are not the best dressed body of men in Europe. I think I have seen a Captain of the Guards in St. James's Park who would burn for as much as one of our demi-brigades. There's not a rag of feather in our army, good argument,

I hope we will not fly. Apropos of that quotation, it is inconceivable how well that most inconceivable of all writers, Shakespeare, has hit off the French character in his play of 'Henry V.' I have been struck with it fifty times this evening; yet it is highly probable he never saw a French officer in his life."

Tone's critical comments are generally sagacious and sound. One of his favourite authors was Lord Chesterfield, whose letters had been his "great resource against ennui." He comments upon them in strong terms, but his language is not much less polished than that of Dr. Johnson when treating the same subject, while his sentiments and those of the sturdy Englishman are in accord. After having recorded that he recurred to his favourite book, he adds:—

"His Lordship a damned soundrel; he advises his son to attack Madame de Blot, because she has been married a year and loves her husband.....I wish I was kicking him! I do not pretend to more virtue than other people, but I have no notion of such cold-blooded villainy on deliberation."

The reader of this work who may begin it with a prejudice against its author cannot but like him before the close, and regret that a man who ought to have been one of his country's worthies should have ended as a rebel without having helped her by his devotion. His honesty is beyond question; his judgment was an unknown quantity. He could neither read the signs of the times nor accommodate himself to his surroundings. But like others whose views on any one subject are out of joint, he was perfectly sensible in matters of general concern. His diary reveals his character, and it displays him as a man of impulse and of fine feeling. His affections were strong, and he never injured a human being. His minor failings are not concealed, and those who judge him from his own confessions may think him worse than he was. He has been depicted as a drunkard. He certainly drank much wine on occasion. There are few who have done so whose record of the result is better reading than Wolfe Tone's narrative of what passed after a dinner on the 1st of November, 1792. He had grown warm with the subject of conversation, which was the formation of a company of volunteers, and then, it is added, he "is very much surprised, on looking down the table, to see two glasses before him; finds, on looking at Hamilton Rowan, that he has got four eyes; various other phenomena in optics equally curious. Mr. Hutton [that is himself], like sun in the centre of the system, fixed, but everything about him moving in a rapid rotation; perfectly sober, but perceives that every one else is getting very drunk; essays to walk across the room, but finds it impossible to move rectilinearly, proceeding entirely from his having taken a sprig of watercresses with his bread at dinner. 'God bless everybody.' Sundry excellent toasts. A round of citizens; that coming into fashion; trifling as it is, it is a symptom. All embrace and depart at twelve. Fine doings! Fine doings!"

Next day the entry is:—

"Sick as Demogorgon; purpose to leave off watercresses with my bread."

Sixteen days later he describes another dinner party at which he was present, and adds:—

"Drink like a fish till past twelve. God bless everybody. Embrace the Connaught men and go to bed as drunk as a lord. It is downright scandalous to see in this, and other journals, how often that occurrence takes place, yet I call myself a sober man!"

As he honestly chronicles his lapses from sobriety, and these are not many in number, he may have been a sober man according to the interpretation which was put on the phrase at the time he lived.

His accounts of the men with whom he associated abroad are instructive, and many of his observations supply food for reflection. After telling how Daendels, a general in the Dutch army, had to fly for his life, how he returned in triumph when his friends were in power, and how he had to fly again on their deposition, he pertinently adds:—

"It is with me a great proof of a man's integrity when, in times of revolution, he is sacrificed alternately by both parties; but certainly what he gains on the score of principle he loses on that of common sense. In order to do any good, with any party, a man must make great sacrifices, not only of his judgment, but what is much worse, I fear, of his conscience also. If he cannot bring his mind to this, there is but one line of conduct for him to pursue, which is to quit the field."

Le Odi di Pindaro. Dichiarate e tradotte da Giuseppe Fraccaroli, Prof. ord. di Letteratura greca nell'Università di Messina. (Verona, Franchini.)

Pindar: Olympian and Pythian Odes. By C. A. M. Fennell, Litt.D. New Edition. (Cambridge, University Press.)

THE first thought that occurs to a critic on glancing at the title-page of Signor Fraccaroli's work is the novelty and appropriateness of the appearance of a commentary on Pindar in the island which is so closely associated with Pindar's muse, and which gave him the themes for many of his greatest hymns. Sicily—Greek for two long periods of history—cannot be said to have established a reputation for Greek scholarship; it would be about the last place one would think of trying if one were seeking an instructor in Pindar's odes to Hiero. But Zankle has come to the rescue, and the attempt of her professor of Greek literature to pay part of the deep debt which the Sicilian cities owe to the genius of Pindar, and diffuse a knowledge of his poetry through Sicily and the peninsula to which she belongs, is decidedly welcome.

Signor Fraccaroli is a good scholar, he knows his Greek grammar, and he has studied his poet laboriously. His work is generally sound, and he possesses considerable taste. The great fault of his book is its excessive length—730 pages, not counting the preface. To the translation of each ode is prefixed a prolix explanation of its argument, and discussions of difficult lines are subjoined in foot-notes. The prolegomena run to 165 pages, and contain a life of Pindar, an account of Dorian lyric poetry, and a disquisition on Pindar's art. All this might easily have been cut down, and the work would have been a gainer. But Signor Fraccaroli has the irritating habit of the man who could not get into a train without descending on the origin of steam-engines. He is never quite at ease if he cannot go back to Adam. Nothing could be more tedious than his discussion "della creazione artistica" when he "trots out"

Plato's theory of knowledge. It is as if an art critic, asked to explain the points of a painting, were to discourse on Locke's distinction of primary and secondary qualities. But allowing for this weakness, the prolegomena contain many interesting remarks. We fully agree with the view that it is an utterly false principle to seek in each ode for some "Grundgedanke" which can be expressed in a precise formula; the thought of the poem is to be found in "la somma delle impressioni di tutte le sentenze e di tutti i miti" (p. 154). And his criticism on Disson's methods and tedious analyses ("noiose analisi"), if not perfectly just, is at all events useful as a corrective. He accepts Westphal's view that the odes are constructed on the basis of the Terpantric nomos, but gives indifferent entertainment to Mezger's theory of verbal responses, though not altogether denying that instances of significant responses are to be found. There is much truth and pertinence in his observations on the way in which one image leads to another without any logical connexion, and many passages, where the adventurous have fancied they detected secret signals, may be easily and fairly explained on this principle. In illustration of it he gives several instances from Dante, of which we cannot refrain from citing two. In 'Purgatory,' xix. 61, Virgil says, in reference to the Siren:—

Suffice it thee, and smite earth with thy heels,
Thine eyes lift upward to the lure that whirls
The eternal King with revolutions vast;
and then Dante proceeds—

Even as the hawk that first his feet surveys,
Then turns him to the call and stretches forward
Through the desire of food that draws him thither,
Such I became, &c.

Here the image of the hawk "is connected materially with the image of the lure, though there is no logical or rational link; the impression of the one has called forth the other." And such an impression can act, unconsciously, according to Signor Fraccaroli, at a considerable distance. Thus in 'Paradise,' xxxi., the image of pilgrims coming from afar—which occurs early in the canto in the lines (31 agg.),

If the barbarians.....
Beholding Rome and all her noble works,
Were wonderstruck, &c., and recurs, in logical connexion, a few lines later (43),—

And as a pilgrim who delighteth him, &c.,— reappears, without any deliberate reason, in 103:—

As he who peradventure from Croatia
Cometh to gaze at our Veronica, &c.

Signor Fraccaroli applies this observation to Iethmian V., where the image of the libation, with which the ode opens, forms the central piece of the myth.

In criticism and exegesis the translator is generally conservative, but has sometimes views of his own. We often find ourselves disagreeing. For example, in Ol. ii. 54, he thinks that the difficult passage beginning αἱ δὲ μὴν ἔχων τις οὐδὲν τὸ μέλλον can be explained by an ellipse of ἐντί, and cites Pyth. xii. 28, which is totally irrelevant to the difficulty. But two verses before, he rejects the interpretation approved by Jebb, Fennell, and others of βαθῆαν ἐπὶ ἔχων μίσησαν ἀγορεύειν ("suggesting a deep ambition for quests"), and explains (independently of Mr. Gildersleeve) "sostenendo la profonda selvaggia cura." In regard to γὰρ ἔσται in the same ode, he thinks that Pindar really had Simonides and Bacchylides in mind, and chose the dual in order that any one who liked might apply it to them. This view has been generally abandoned.

It is not necessary to quote a specimen of Signor Fraccaroli's translation, which to English readers will be of little interest.

The second edition of Dr. Fennell's useful commentary on the Olympian and Pythian Odes possesses new features. The editor has wisely omitted etymological notes, which, except in the rare cases where etymology throws definite light on the meaning of a passage, are impertinent in exegetical notes. He has chronicled at the beginning of each ode all the "tautomeric responses" he could discover. But he does not therefore accept the catchword theory of Mezger—which in some recent books on Pindar has been carried to such absurd lengths; he admits that the recurrence of words may occasionally have some reference to the sense, but holds that they are more often concerned with sound. He still maintains the extraordinary view that "metrical literature was not committed to writing in Greece for nearly a generation after the Persian wars."

The gravest complaint that we have to make against Dr. Fennell is that he gives so little help to the understanding of the arguments of the odes, beyond the very meagre "Analyses." And the desire to compress, which in this edition is carried painfully far, often hinders him from explaining sufficiently the difficulties in the text. In a passage in Ol. ii. (57 agg.), which in our opinion he treats inadequately and misleadingly, we are told that "Rauch's explanation is condemned by his separation of ἰσθῆδε from θαυρόντες"—where "Rauch" means Rauchenstein, a favourable specimen of the penurious system of abbreviation adopted—but we are not told what "Rauch's explanation" is. Mr. Fennell surely does not expect the students who use his edition as a text-book to possess a Pindaric library. In the introduction to Ol. xi.—why, Fraccaroli pertinently asks, should x. and xi. be transposed, unless we arrange all the odes on chronological principles?—Mr. Fennell promises to discuss the relations of Anaxilaus with Hiero, and the relations of the Locrians with both tyrants, in the introduction to Pyth. ii. But when we come to that introduction Anaxilaus is not mentioned, presumably owing to considerations of space. If Mr. Fennell had allowed himself a little more room, he would have done himself a great deal more justice.

NEW NOVELS.

A Precious Scamp. By Henry Cresswell. 3 vols. (Hutchinson & Co.)

MR. CRESSWELL'S new novel, clever, but very unsympathetic in manner and matter, contains more than one scamp. The scamp par excellence is of course Harry Bethel, who, all the same, makes a fine end. The sentiments and morals of this clever gentleman are more than irreproachable, except where his commercial code is concerned. As may be imagined, he is, in Mr. Cresswell's hands, a curious study. The author's object—supposing him to have one—seems to be to show the undermining influence of money-making, and that fortunes are not to be gained by honourable men; also that you may be a scamp in business matters, and a good man in other relations of life. There is a core of truth in the view, but we fancy Mr. Cresswell brings an unnecessary and exaggerated bitterness to bear, and thereby, to some extent, defeats his own object. He talks of the book as "voracious"; whether or not it be so, so much outrageous, unmitigated fraud and rascality, or merely dishonest dealing, cannot be worked into one story without destroying its artistic balance. The City may be the den of thieves he represents, yet, even there, there must be a certain percentage of clean and yet capable hands. Nineteenth century commercial morality is at a low ebb, perhaps, but if this picture is to be accepted as lifelike, it is rotten to the heart. The part of the one righteous man is played by Percy Bethel, the brother of Harry, but he is a mere dummy. Old Mr. Maxstead, a City Father, is a good rather than a bad sort of man, but woefully weak of will. He is, at any rate, a human being, and so are his poor little daughters. A quartet of sharks—business men, and out-and-out scoundrels of different types—spread their nets in the sight of the reader. A good deal of interesting and rather surprising detail gathers about their schemes. The gigantic fraud perpetrated by the precious scamp on a stupider and more despicable rogue is ingenious and to some extent credible, though the character of the perpetrator is often very inadequately treated. Mr. Loxley, too, is insufficiently furnished with motives, especially for his extraordinary action with regard to his only daughter. The same thing applies to others—both men and women. They are riddles without answers, problems that have no key—neither of the stuff of every-day life, nor yet in any way ideal. Mr. Cresswell is a clever writer, but it seems to us his readers had need to be clever, too, to get real satisfaction out of his brilliant but hollow material. Of the manifest improbability of the non-recognition of one brother by another we say nothing.

A Bairneth Pilgrimage. By Edith E. Cuthell. 2 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

THE notion of writing a society novel the scene of which is chiefly laid at the musical Mecca—as the musical critics have it—has, unless we are much mistaken, never yet been exploited, and Mrs. Cuthell is undoubtedly entitled to some credit for her enterprise. On general grounds, however, the new departure is not to be applauded. In the millennium, perhaps, every one will be thoroughly versed in the works of Wagner. But at the present day the novel-reading world is hardly ripe for fiction which cannot be duly appreciated without an intimate knowledge of musical "shop" of all sorts, and in which public performers are alluded to under thinly veiled pseudonyms. A good deal of the book may be described as a Wagnerian analytical programme cast in the form of a dialogue. Even to musical enthusiasts this method may not appear to be altogether a change for the better.

The Best of her Sex. By Fergus Hume. 2 vols. (Allen & Co.)

MR. HUME's title is not particularly appropriate, for it leads his readers away from the gist of the matter, and is a mere commonplace when applied to a girl who makes an excellent daughter to a selfish father, and an excellent wife to an unselfish husband. There are so many of that sort, and they cannot all be best. The main feature of the novel is the formation of a limited company (of two) for the purpose of introducing the virtues of Tho as a specific in nervous affections, and by judicious puffery an enormous demand is created. Mr. Hume is amusing and ingenious in developing this plan; but there is, perhaps, more ingenuity than skill displayed in providing machinery and motive power to put the plan in action.

Major Joshua. By Francis Forster. (Longmans & Co.)

'MAJOR JOSHUA' is a study in selfishness—a harmonious, a consistent, and an artistic study, since we have the quality illustrated in various characters, and recognized as a subject for detailed observation and interpretation, without any attempt to label it with hard names, or to render it hideous for moral purposes. Major Joshua Robinson is a wealthy gastronome, with a theory and a practice of self-pleasing; his absolute candour on the one hand, and freedom from vanity on the other, enable him to live a life of unruffled contentment. His friend Mrs. Fenwick has two daughters, whom she has brought up on a system, teaching them that it is to their advantage to be entirely selfish; that they have hearts only in order that some one may break them; that self-denial, kindness, charity, are weaknesses which minister to the lower instincts in others. The elder girl is beautiful, hates her plain sister, marries, and is happy. The younger one, having no compensation of beauty, is a savage with a volcano in her breast, and passes, as we are assured, through the gates of hell. There are two young men who assist to develop the character and fate of these girls; and altogether the story is well thought out and highly entertaining.

The Businesses of a Busy Man. By R. S. Warren Bell. (Leadenhall Press.)

MR. BELL's book is a funny one from beginning to end. The humour is of a kind which has been supposed to be much in favour of late; it is boisterous, unremitting through two hundred pages, undiluted and undisguised. It is, indeed, so unremitting that one hardly thinks it worth while to reward the joker with a laugh, lest he should reasonably complain of undue preference for one jest over another. Everybody in the book jokes without difficulty, but most of all the author himself, until one longs for a dull, unjesting page or two, to break the long monotony of fun. The reader will understand what he has to expect from 'The Businesses of a Busy Man'; and, if he sends for it on the strength of what has been said, there is really no reason why he should not be thoroughly satisfied.

Pharais: a Romance of the Isles. By Fiona Macleod. (Derby, Murray.)

'PHARAIS'—let it be said at once that the word is an Anglicized form of the Gaelic for "paradise"—would be admirable, both as a story and as a study of a kind of insanity only possible, we imagine, in the remoter habitations of the Celt, but for two faults which constantly interfere with the progress of the narrative. The book is sadly over-written, in a style which, being florid and overburdened with weighty Latin compounds, is too complex for the matter wherein the author deals. The local colour also is laid on with a joyous extravagance, which speaks well enough for Miss Macleod's observation, to be sure, but serves to defeat her aim by irritating the Southron reader. If a writer elect to till one of "the half-acres of literature," as an American writer lately called the provinces over which it is now the fashion for romancers to "peg out" their "claims," economy, even parsimony, in the distribution of local colour is an essential of success. Miss Macleod's second defect is, like the first, a defect of generosity. The characters of 'Pharais' (characters whom she understands thoroughly) may be compared to Fitzroy barometers, in that they tremble and turn and are very nearly changed before every variation of wind or weather. They are designed on definite lines, but a passing cloud, the boom of a wave, an effect of moonlight, sets them acting almost discordantly with themselves. The islander of the North-West is, indeed, a creature of the elements, but they do not, we think, act upon him so swiftly and so transiently here on our every-day earth as they are made to do in 'Pharais.' Rather would we say that his way of life is the resultant of several forces, of which climate is the chief in moment. Now for the more gracious task of praise. It is unstinted praise that Miss Macleod deserves. She has justified the Northern Celts against the too-disparaging strictures of Mr. Yeats. True, there is a gloom and a blight upon their days; the wind speaks in their ears, as it were, with the cry of an everlasting sorrow; and they live at ceaseless war—often at unavailing war—with the malignant principles of the universe. Miss Macleod has touched that strife to effects of beauty. Her story relates how Alastair Macleod was smitten with the "mind-dark," a form of hereditary insanity, or rather of idiocy, too well known in these islands, where spare nourishment and in-breeding work together with results that would delight a morbo-psychologist. The scene in which he discloses to his wife the naked awfulness of his impending dehumanization is a spectacle of the noblest passion, and the language is simple, dignified, and worthy of so high an issue. Lora's attempt to commit suicide with him in a lonely cave of the sea, for the sake of the child yet to be born, is too terrible almost for memory; and here, as in the other scene, the author rises far above her usual level. The Celt is a child of vain visions and decaying faiths; and this Miss Macleod understands. Few, indeed, are the writers who have brought out so significantly as she the full terror of these faiths and visions when they take hold upon sensitive imaginations. 'Pharais' is not for the idle; and as certainly not for the nervous. But for those who can brave the shadow of a great horror—yes.

The Daughter of Leontius; or, Phases of Byzantine Life, Social and Religious, in the Fifth Century after Christ. By J. D. Craig Houston, B.D. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

WE frankly confess that we should have enjoyed Mr. Craig Houston's book a good deal more if he had been less conscientious, and had given a freer rein to his imagination. It takes a Kingsley, no doubt, to produce a 'Hypatia'; but in the hands of a livelier and bolder writer the romantic story of Athenais, daughter of a Greek Sophist, who rose to be Empress of the East, would certainly have been invested with more than archeological interest. As it is, the result of Mr. Craig Houston's method is colourless in the extreme. A passage taken at random from the opening of the fourth chapter, "Church Life in Constantinople," will at once explain our meaning:—

"We have said that the sister of Leontius, with whom Athenais had taken up her abode in Constantinople, was a Christian lady. That fact alone justifies us in believing that the Hippodrome, with its frivolous and withal pagan amusements, would not be the only aspect of Byzantine life that Athenais would be afforded an opportunity of witnessing. We could as easily think that she lived without seeing the sun for a whole month after her arrival in her new place of sojourn, as suppose that her aunt would allow even half that time to elapse before she persuaded her interesting niece to accompany her to divine service in one of the churches of Constantinople. Of such edifices there was of course no lack."

Then follow two pages describing the churches of St. Sophia and the Holy Apostles, and the sacred building known as Anastasia:—

"To one or other of these celebrated churches we may be very sure Athenais was conducted soon after her arrival in the Eastern capital. Nor would she, we are persuaded, offer the least objection to paying such a visit." Surely it would have been better to dispense with all these cautious inferences and surmises, and to assert that Athenais "went" to church with her aunt, rather than that she "would undoubtedly have gone" there. Nobody, so far as we can see, would be a penny the worse for the statement, and the book would be much more agreeable reading. Having made this criticism, however, which naturally applies to the whole of Mr. Craig Houston's narrative, we have nothing but praise for the industry and ability with which he has collected the materials for it.

La Monégasque. Par Jean Blaize. (Paris, Plon.)

'LA MONÉGAQUE' comes near to being a good novel. The Monaco lady herself, who is the heroine, is not over well drawn, and the young doctor from Monte Carlo, who is her husband and the hero, is also not a strong character. On the other hand, some of the shopkeepers of Monaco and the Condamine are admirably drawn, and so is an old doctor of great distinction in Paris; and the novel forms a careful piece of work, which is not without interest, and is, indeed, in some parts difficult to lay aside. The struggles of the good man and his indifferent wife, and the effect upon her of an education in the neighbourhood of gaming tables, are well studied, in spite of the flabbiness of the chief characters.

BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

Korea and the Sacred White Mountain: being a Brief Account of a Journey in Korea in 1891. By Capt. A. E. J. Cavendish. Together with an Account of an Ascent of the White Mountain by Capt. H. K. Goold-Adams. (Philip & Son.)—Of all civilized peoples the English show the strongest and most frequent desire to return on occasions to barbarous life. And of the English race those who ordinarily live the most pampered lives are those in whom the propensity seems to be predominant. Guardsmen accustomed to life in Pall Mall and luxurious country houses find their supreme happiness in sharing the huts of African savages, or of camping out in the neighbourhood of the snow line on the Himalaya Mountains; and Indian civilians seek for relief in the wilds of Central Asia from the studied comfort of station existence. The more wild and savage the country, the greater are its attractions to these travellers, and on this principle Korea presents an ideal hunting ground, since there are few portions of the globe which offer fewer attractions and greater difficulties to the tourist. Not long since these characteristics attracted Mr. James, of the Indian Civil Service, who preferred spending a long leave in the squalid provinces of Korea to visiting his native land; and now Capt. Cavendish and Goold-Adams have been devoting some weeks to the same surroundings. Being quartered at Hong-Kong, and being therefore within range of no bigger game than pheasants, the attraction of possible tiger and bear shooting in Korea was more than they could resist. During their tour they heard of tigers and bears in abundance, and in one place which they visited eighteen people had lately been killed by tigers in one year. But, as fortune and their Korean guides determined, they saw nothing but the occasional trail of big game, and had to content themselves with sport which they might equally well have found on the shores of the Canton river. As in duty bound, they started from Seoul, and from that point traversed the whole country northwards to the borders of Manchuria. Although the book is brightly written it tells us nothing that is new. The travellers had in no way prepared themselves for the scientific observance either of the people or of the country. They give, therefore, only the result of their very superficial experiences. The reader hears enough and more than enough of the dirt of the people, the discomfort of the inns, and the miserable condition of the roads; but of weightier matters he is told nothing. Capt. Cavendish had to return to Hong-Kong without making the ascent of the Long White Mountains, and from the foot of that range Capt. Goold-Adams takes up the pen. The book will be found useful to those who may desire to follow in the footsteps of the travellers, and who may wish to learn from their experiences which places and inns to stop at and which to avoid. But for the "general reader" the book offers few attractions, and is besides disfigured by an occasional coarseness in description which is repellent. It contains two good maps and some illustrations.

THE general impression which remains after a study of most books on African shooting—that the country is uninviting and unhealthy and the sport indifferent—is confirmed by reading The Congo Free State and its Big Game Shooting, by Bula N'zau (Chapman & Hall). The author, Mr. Henry Bailey, seems to have well earned his nom de guerre, which being interpreted means the elephant smasher. He possesses evidently the first qualities of a successful big game shot—the determination to approach his quarry, however dangerous, so close that a miss or badly placed bullet is almost an impossibility, and the nerve which prevents failure or ensures escape, backed evidently by considerable strength of body and of constitution. With all this there is occasionally apparent in the descriptions a callousness to the sufferings which his game may have to endure which is, we think, to be regretted, though no doubt the greater part of the animals killed was eaten by his followers. In most parts of the country visited the game was undisturbed, approach was often very easy, and the science of woodcraft and stalking was seldom called into play. Hence some of the chief elements of interest and delight in such excursions were absent. Nevertheless the book, which is legibly printed, fairly illustrated, and generally well turned out, cannot fail to be of use to any one who visits the Congo on business or pleasure.

On Sunny Shores. By Clinton Scollard. (Gay & Bird.)—This is a Transatlantic production. Mr. Scollard has visited many well-known places in Europe and Syria, and writes about them as an educated man might be expected to do; but there was no special reason why he should publish his lucubrations.

The Gypsy Road is an account of a cycling tour of a thousand and odd miles from Cracow to Coblenz, made by Mr. Granville A. J. Cole, M.R.I.A., F.G.S., and a companion, who is dubbed the "Observer." Why it should have been called "The Gypsy Road" we have no more idea than a reviewer had lately why a novel about Stratford should have been called "Thorough." Else there is nothing in it more remarkable than that the Armada is said to have "advanced slowly, with curved front, in Plymouth Sound," and that Mr. Cole chooses to write of "the Indian 'Mutiny.'" Of the fineness, the superfineness of the style one sample may suffice:—"The market-place seems to beam with a quaint hilarity upon the traveller; one recognizes a cheery fulsomeness—Bohemia is assez riante."

SHORT STORIES.

The Purification of Dolores Silva, &c. By Morley Roberts. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)—Mr. Morley Roberts is already known as a pithy writer of short stories, and the present book will do no discredit to his reputation. It is essentially the book of a man who has travelled much and who has observed keenly and with imagination the characteristics of the people among whom he went. Whether it be the artistic life of Paris, that of clubland in London, or of a gold-digger in America, which forms the basis of his stories, the milieu always has more reality than mere nomenclature to justify it, and further has a certain appropriateness to the theme chosen for the story. The subjects are nearly all different phases of love in women, from the initiation into its mysteries, which forms the subject of the first story, to the final story about purification by self-sacrifice, and the consequent substitution of a noble love for a gross and debasing passion; in this story the hot Mexican blood which runs in Dolores Silva's veins excites and gives probability to the extravagance of her penance. But the best two stories are 'When She May' and 'Panic,' the first an original and striking picture of indifference turned into a hopeless love by jealousy, and the second a terrible glimpse of a sudden fit of cowardice and its swift retribution. One or two of the other stories have hardly enough body in them to make them worthy of such good company.

Jack's Partner, &c. By Stephen Fiske. (Gay & Bird.)—Mr. Joseph Hatton's brief introductory account of the author suggests the idea that in Mr. Fiske we have the George Sims of America, a suggestion which is confirmed by a perusal of his book. In fact, these stories are so very much the sort of thing which Mr. Sims writes, and his style is so well known here, that hardly any further criticism seems called for. There is the same genial jocularity, the same thinness of motive joined to a faculty for making the most of what is in the author's mind, and the same irreproachable, not to say claspnet sentiment. If there is any difference, it is that Mr. Fiske displays with rather more ostentation than the English writer what Mr. Hatton calls his "sympathies with struggling merit and honest poverty."

LOCAL HISTORY.

Somersetshire: Highways, Byways, and Waterways. Written and illustrated by C. R. B. Barrett. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)—This is not, so far as the text goes, a work of original research. The author has been content to take the information which he supplies from ordinary books of history or reference; he has, however, in most instances made a judicious selection of the authorities on which he has relied. His chief object has been to furnish a series of engraved illustrations of Somersetshire buildings and works of art. We have little but praise to give to these, and the selection has in most cases been judicious. Thus places and objects which have been engraved over and over again are, if not omitted altogether, dealt with in a frugal manner, while those nearly unknown are given with considerable detail. Cleve Abbey alone would easily furnish material for a work far larger than Mr. Barrett's volume, and the same thing may be said of Dunster, with its castle, church, and market-house. We are supplied with an excellent sketch of the market-house. In the old days Dunster was a manufacturing town, doing no inconsiderable trade in yarns and broad-cloths. When this first grew into importance we do not know. The market-house was built, as we may assume from a date on the vane, in 1647; but we cannot be by any means sure that it does not supply the place of an earlier structure. The steam engine has destroyed the trade of Dunster, but the market-house or yarn market remains as a memorial of a decayed industry. It is a most curious building, but one which it is impossible to describe without the help of illustrations. Mr. Barrett has given two illustrations of the Lutterell Arms, an old inn which, although modernized, contains much of interest. The porch is, we imagine, the oldest part of the building. The cross-bow loopholes seem to point to a time when it might have been necessary to defend the place from armed attack. The carved woodwork of the back wing is also interesting. We regret that the scale on which Mr. Barrett has sketched is so small that it is not easy to make out its characteristic features. The question is often asked, When did burial in coffins become the universal practice in this country? It is one not easy to answer. The bier preserved in the south porch of Trent helps us somewhat, as it bears what the author regards as the genuine date of 1757. As we have not ourselves seen it, we cannot be certain that it has not been made for carrying coffins; but unless there be some structural reason for concluding that such has been the case, we must regard it as highly improbable. Witham, though its ancient glories have perished, is still an interesting place from its connexion with St. Hugh of Avalon, the canonized bishop of Lincoln. Here was the first house of the Carthusian order in England. It was founded by Henry II., who, though not by any means strait-laced so far as his own actions were concerned, seems to have had a great respect for the ascetic children of St. Bruno. There were originally two churches at Witham, one for the use of such of the monks as were in holy orders, the other for the lay brethren. That the church now remaining is in great part the work of St. Hugh does not, in Mr. Barrett's opinion, admit of doubt, but he, like those who have gone before him, is by no means sure which of the two churches it is. The matter is, in our opinion, incapable of being decided, unless some day or other excavations should disclose the foundations, and consequently the plan, of the lost church. The author remarks on the fact that the interesting Norman font at Lullington, of which he gives a sketch, has marks upon it indicating that it was once provided with a lid fixed to the stone by a hinge. Nearly every pre-Reformation font that we have examined has shown traces that means had been taken for securing the water inside from profane or meddlesome hands. In the decrees regarding the ornaments of churches issued by Winchelsey, Archbishop of Canterbury (1293-1313), and Gray, Archbishop of York (1216-1255), it was ordered that there should be in each church a font with a lock; and the Council of Durham held in 1220 decreed that "fontes sub sera clausi teneantur propter sortilegia." We cannot conclude our remarks without pointing out that Mr. Barrett has furnished his book with an excellent index.

A Brief and Popular History of the Hospital of God's House, Southampton. By the Rev. J. Aston Whitlock. (Southampton, Gilbert.)—It is not quite fair to call this book a history. Brief it certainly is—there are but sixty-four pages printed in large type; as to its being popular there is room for differences of opinion; we should rather call it scrappy and disconnected. The author, however, deals fairly with his readers. He tells them in the preface that lest he should weary the eyes of his readers he has used "as few foot-notes and inverted commas as possible." This is all very well in a romance, but in a history, unless it be a mere school compendium, references are an absolute necessity for every one who reads for any higher purpose than amusement. The Hospital of God's House at Southampton is worthy of a detailed history. This little book may serve the good purpose of directing attention to the subject. It certainly will not stand in the way of any future work constructed on broader and firmer lines. The Domus Dei, Maison Dieu, or God's House at Southampton was founded somewhere about the year 1185 by Gervaise the Portreeve. Southampton did not possess a mayor until a few years after Gervaise's death. We may be pretty sure that the Portreeve discharged many of the functions which devolved upon the mayor when the town had been incorporated by charter, but these would not be his only duties. The Portreeve of an important place like Southampton was, we may be certain, a custom-house officer and harbour master. Mr. Whitlock asks, "What impelled moved the good Gervaise to found his hospital?" No certain answer can be given, but we may assume as highly probable that he had long seen, when discharging his official duties, the miseries sustained by Englishmen returning from abroad. There were two classes of wanderers in those days which must have moved any good man's sympathies. First there were the wounded and diseased English soldiers, who had served the king in his wars in France—poor unhappy creatures who had lost everything but life in the royal service, and had then been turned adrift to make their way to the old home in England in the best manner they could. Then there were the pilgrims, many of whom would return in a plight little less evil than that of the soldiers. We must not draw our ideas of pilgrims solely from Chaucer or the partisan writers of the sixteenth century. There were, we may be sure, many of them who went on their wanderings from religious motives, others from the same spirit of adventure which now leads some of our countrymen to try to reach the North Pole, to wander in Central Africa, or risk death in the fever-laden swamps of South America. There were also other pilgrims who had been sent by kings, bishops, or abbots on messages, carrying letters, and in some cases coin, into foreign lands. Many of these would land at Southampton weary and destitute, and it was a good thought of Gervaise to build and endow a hospital where these poor creatures could be carefully and kindly treated. There were both brethren and sisters attached to the house, whose duty it was to act as nurses, and attend on the wants of the sick. The founder caused his hospital to be dedicated to St. Julian, the patron of travellers, and vested the patronage in the successive bishops of Winchester. Several succeeding kings took an interest in Gervaise's hospital; at last Edward III. granted it to Queen's Hall—now Queen's College—Oxford. Thus a corporation (not a single person) has been down to the present date the warden of God's House. This seems to have been an unwise proceeding. It was benefiting the cause of education at the expense of poor suffering wanderers. Good has, however, come out of evil. Had the hospital remained as Gervaise wished it to continue, it would have been confiscated by Henry VIII. It, however, escaped the grasp of the plunderers on the ground that its revenues were devoted to learning and education. Nearly all the old buildings have perished. The chapel remains, that is has been rebuilt, preserving the chancel arch. For this we may be thankful, but what are we to say of restorers who wilfully destroyed a low side window which Mr. Whitlock says was in the south-west corner of the building? It was about breast-high, in the form of a quatrefoil. Among the fragments which still remain is, the author says, a Norman chimney. If this be so, we trust the people of Southampton will do their best to preserve it. As a hospital, in the sense of the founder, God's House may be said to have ceased to exist, but two brethren and two sisters are still there, and when a vacancy occurs the college authorities fill it up. The old chapel of St. Julian was assigned early in the reign of Elizabeth to certain Huguenot refugees. A French congregation has still possession of the new building, though we gather that there has never been a charter investing them with rights over a building which seems to belong to Queen's College. Three hundred and thirty years' possession may be assumed to be a sufficient title.

Ramsay Cartulary. By W. H. Hart and P. A. Lyons. Vol. III. (Stationery Office.)—We are glad to see this cartulary brought at length to its conclusion. It is, perhaps, because of the extent of the work that, contrary to the usual practice, the present volume is deprived of an introduction. Important for its elaborate character and evidently early date is a survey of the Abbey's manors (pp. 241-315), which we may compare with the St. Paul's fragment of the Domesday of Ralf de "Diceto" in 1181. They both record sworn inquests, and both refer throughout to the days of Henry I., just as Domesday Book refers to the days of King Edward. As this Ramsay survey records cases (pp. 261, 270) in which the tenant temp. Henry I. still held the land, it can scarcely be later than 1180. We cannot have too many of these twelfth century surveys in print: they all help us to solve the still puzzling problems connected with Domesday Book and with the land. Next in importance are the documents relating to the Abbey's knights and knight-service. These will be found at pp. 48-53, 218-220. It is, though almost incredible, a fact that in both places the Abbey's carta of 1166 was dated by the editors "1184-1189"; the error, we hasten to add, is set right in the corrigenda, but that it should ever have been made is discreditable enough. Ramsay is a test case for knight-service, having peculiarities of its own. We need not apologize, therefore, for calling attention to the importance of the version here given (from Galba, E. X.) of the Abbey's carta, which seems to us to represent the original document, and to modify the conclusion of Dr. Stubbs. The proceedings as to knight-service under Henry III. also should be compared, we may observe, with Prof. Maitland's edition of the rolls of the Abbot's court. Another interesting item in this volume is the catalogue of the abbots (pp. 171-189). It is greatly to be regretted that there is no work for the religious houses such as Le Neve's 'Fasti' for the bishops' sees: dated lists of the English abbots would be of great chronological value. As usual in cartularies, the records of lawsuits in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries are too often of little general interest; what historical students want, but are not likely to get, is a collection from cartularies of those documents and surveys of real value which remain at present scattered about in manuscript. The 'Ramsay Cartulary' has suffered from the overlapping of the 'Ramsay Chronicle' (also in the Rolls Series), nor has its editing been perfect. Mr. Kirk is responsible for the index to the three volumes, in which, we observe, "ward-penes" are indexed separately from "ward-peny," with no cross-reference, as if the identity had escaped him.

An Old Kirk Chronicle, by the Rev. P. Hately Waddell (Blackwood & Sons), is a history, "from session records," of Auldham, Tynninghame, and Whitekirk, three parishes of East Lothian, between North Berwick and Dunbar, the first two of which were united in 1619, and the third in 1761. It is a beautiful volume, adorned with twenty-two finely executed illustrations, and it contains a great mass of curious matter as to Scottish church life in the seventeenth century. But when in its preface we read that "this book has been written from a sense of duty," &c., and when neither in that preface nor in the body of the work we light on the slightest allusion to 'The Churches of St. Baldred: Auldham, Whitekirk, Tynninghame, Prestonkirk,' by A. I. Ritchie (Edinburgh, 1883, 281 pages), we are filled with astonishment. It seems impossible that Mr. Waddell can be ignorant of the predecessor in whose footprints he treads so exactly; it seems still more impossible that, knowing of him, he could wilfully ignore him. Anyhow, to review at length 'An Old Kirk Chronicle' would be wholly superfluous; we will merely observe that Queen Mary was not in power in 1580, and that Charles I. did not suddenly appear in the Scottish lines on the next day after his defeat at Naseby. These mistakes at least are original.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

We regret that in A Poet's Portfolio: Later Readings (Blackwood & Sons) Mr. Story has not seen fit to follow the advice we gave him, in all friendliness, when reviewing his former book, 'Conversations in a Studio.' He still clings to his ameban methods, and prefaces each of his poems with a tiresome dialogue, which recalls the artless prattle of the infantile interlocutors in Mrs. Markham's 'History of England.' As thus:—

He. In his old age he dedicated to her some verses, in which he strove, however inadequately, to express his feelings. Would you like to hear them? I have them, I think, here in my portfolio. Yes, here they are.

She. Do read them.

He. [Reads.]

Or again:—

He. And, by the way, here are some verses which my friend X. wrote, which perhaps may interest you, as in some way illustrating what I was saying.

She. Read them, please.

He. They embody only a man's feelings, as well as an artist's, and perhaps you will not sympathize with them. Your memories as a woman would naturally be so different.

She. Read them, and don't make any more apologies and explanations. You know what pleasure it gives me.

He. Well, here they are. [Reads.]

It is as though when each course of a dinner is served up the cook should appear upon the scene, and inform the guests what it is made of, how it is made, and wherein its special tooth-someness lies. We presume that it must be the object of the author to ensure that the reader shall not by any chance, however remote, misinterpret his meaning: for certainly these prose discussions have little intrinsic merit to recommend them. As for the verse itself, we gladly admit that Mr. Story's 'Portfolio' contains several very pretty poems (though "He" objects to "Her" applying that epithet to them), and we may instance the lines on old age, beginning "To crawl between earth and heaven," as well as "Fioretta" and "A Passing Cloud," with which the volume concludes. Faust's answer to Mephistopheles, as Mr. Story handles it, is also vigorous and well conceived; while "A Battle Hymn" and the captain's speech to his crew before the fight with the Armada have no little energy and swing. But sandwiched as they are between solid slices of conversation they lose a good deal of such charm as they possess.

UNDER the title of Green Pastures, Mr. Stock has published a pretty volume of extracts from the writings of Robert Greene. The selection has been made by Mr. Grosart.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & BOWDEN send us a shilling Guide to London, which is fairly good, but it needs revision. St. Paul's Cathedral is certainly not a specimen "of Grecian architecture."—Those useful volumes Dickens's Dictionary of London and Dickens's Dictionary of the Thames (Smith) have appeared in new editions.

MESSRS. WARNE & Co. have issued an "Albion Edition" of Pope's translations of the Iliad and Odyssey. The cuts from Flaxman's designs and Buckley's notes appeared originally, if we mistake not, in the reprint issued by Ingram & Cooke forty years ago and more.

A Sea Queen is the latest instalment of the handy edition of Mr. Clark Russell's novels which Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. are publishing.—Messrs. Macmillan send us new editions of Gravel Gravel, by Miss Yonge, and The Curate in Charge, by Mrs. Oliphant.—Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co. have brought out a revised edition of Sir John Strachey's able work on India.

WE have on our table Desert London, and other Fancies, by J. Burnley (M. Smith & Co.),—The Persian Vizier, and other Poems, by F. H. Cliffe (Remington),—Sonnets, and other Verses, by W. Gay (Petherick),—Nemo Academy, a Series-Comic, sometime Dramatic, finally Tragical Farce (Digby & Long),—The Lollandilaff Legends, by L. Lollandilaff (Cassell),—Grace Bell, and other Poems, by J. Mallett (McCorquodale),—An Introduction to the Study of Hebrew, by J. T. L. Maggs (C. H. Kelly),—Arnold's Bible Readers, by M. T. Yates, LL.D.: Book I., Simple Bible Stories; Book II., Old Testament Stories; Book III., New Testament Stories (Arnold),—The Witness of the American Church to Pure Christianity, by the Right Rev. GILBERT A BECKET.

(The Musical Rights Reserved.)

THROUGH brawling Biscay to Ceuta's wave
He has ridden unwrecked, our merchant brave;
But, Gilbert & Becket, beware, beware!
For that sudden sail is the curst Corsair.

They have rifled his silks and his good red gold,
And hurled him to rot in a dungeon bold;
Till, Gilbert & Becket, for love of thee,
Thy gaoler's daughter hath set thee free!

Starry eyes and a storm of hair,
And a voice like the wind harp on the air;
But "Gilbert," "London," ere he goes,
All, all of his Northern speech she knows.

He has spun fresh silk, he has gotten fresh gold,
But his heart is behind in the Pirate's hold.
Now, Gilbert & Becket, what boots our wealth,
If a canker lurks in our rose of health?

Yet say, what burthen of song is borne
Through thy open casement this summer morn!
"Gilbert," "Gilbert," its accents rise,
"Gilbert," "Gilbert," despairing it dies.

Down the stair and into the street
He has flashed, his faithful love to meet.
Maid, in whose arms art thou folded fast?
"Gilbert," "Gilbert," at last, at last!

ALFRED PERCEVAL GRAVES.

LORD COLERIDGE.

LORD COLERIDGE's death occurred too late to allow the appearance in these columns last week of a brief tribute to the bearer of one of England's most illustrious names. Never did the late Lord Chief Justice forget that he was the grand-nephew of the poet as well as the son of a judge and the grandson and nephew, on both his father's and mother's side, of Anglican clergymen. To all those traditions he was loyal through life, as Queen's Counsel, as member of Parliament, as Attorney-General, as Lord Chief Justice. He might not be familiar with the name of a burlesque actress; but in law, in literature, in religion, he was one of the best-informed men of his time. Naturally enough, during his latest years, his thoughts reverted to men and books and pictures of a lapsed generation, though he kept himself acquainted with contemporary poetry and fiction to the very end.

Shakspeare he set above all poets, ancient and modern, and next to him Milton and then Wordsworth. "But would you put Wordsworth below Milton?" Lord Tennyson once rather surprised him by asking. To Tennyson himself, if you come to list-making, he assigned a lower place than would, perhaps, be generally approved. Browning, when he understood, he admired. His story of Browning's saying to him, "A reader of your calibre ought to be content if he understands ten per cent. of what I write," must have been, from all points of view, the merest jest. In the estimate of English poets he made in an address delivered in Yorkshire in 1893, and published in the Contemporary Review, he omitted his great-uncle, lacking, as he thought, the judicial impartiality necessary to a just decision. But in a public panegyric in Westminster Abbey and among friends he made no secret of his enthusiastic admiration. Of the half-dozen great pieces by which Coleridge endures, he thought that they were the high-water mark of the English poetry of this century; and to the usual list of 'The Ancient Mariner,' 'Kubla Khan,' 'Love,' and one or two others, he added, one thought rather arbitrarily, the 'Ode to the Departing Year.' With some feeling Lord Coleridge complained that all poets had written too much—all had, he thought, except Gray and Wolfe. In prose his greatest admiration was for Lord Bolingbroke among old masters of English, and for Cardinal Newman among moderns.

Lord Coleridge's constant admiration must have more than atoned for the humbly which his father addressed to Newman in delivering the Achilli judgment. The younger Coleridge was at Balliol when Newman preached in St. Mary's, and never did he willingly miss an opportunity of being among the hearers. It was then he formed an opinion expressed in later years: "Raffaello is said to have thanked God that he lived in the days of Michael Angelo. There are scores of men I know, there are hundreds and thousands I believe, who thank God they have lived in the days of John Henry Newman." Again, in the letter which he wrote for publication in Prof. Knight's 'Memoir of Principal Shairp,' he says:—

"No notice of any Oxford man of that period, who took life seriously, can omit that great penetrating influence, that waking up of the soul, that revelation of hopes, desires, motives, duties not of this world, not ending here even if here they had their beginning, which came to us weak by week from the pulpit of St. Mary's, and day by day from the writings and the silent presence among us of that great man, a Roman Cardinal in title, but the light and guide of multitudes of grateful hearts outside his own communion, and beyond the limits of these small islands."

This letter was written in 1887, and was first published in the August of the following year, in Macmillan's Magazine—one of Lord Coleridge's infrequent contributions to literature. To his father's memoir of Keble he contributed a letter; also prefaces to an 1870 edition of Blossius's 'Mirror for Monks,' to an 1874 edition of Sara Coleridge's 'Phantasmion,' and, in 1888, to the second series, posthumously issued, of Matthew Arnold's 'Essays in Criticism.' It has been remarked that Lord Coleridge's handwriting resembled Matthew Arnold's; but it resembled the poet Coleridge's even more. Lord Coleridge also read before a Devonshire architectural society a paper 'On the Restoration of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin at Ottery St. Mary—the church where his body now lies.' W. M.

PROPOSED TASSO CENTENARY IN 1895.

22, Holbein House, St. Anne Square, June 18, 1894.

It is intended to celebrate on April 26th, 1895, the third centenary of the death of Torquato Tasso. A new life of the poet is being written for the occasion by Prof. Angelo Solerti, of Bologna, whose name is considered in Italy to be a sufficient guarantee for the work being well done, and is to be published early in next year by Messrs. Loescher & Co., of Rome and Turin. This book will embody the valuable matter contained in some 500 documents hitherto unpublished, and will be illustrated with photogravures of all the portraits of which copies can be obtained, besides other interesting memorials. Prof. Solerti is also preparing a new and critical edition of the minor poems of Tasso, of which two volumes have been already published by Messrs. Zanichelli, of Bologna. Knowing that England has many admirers of the author of the 'Aminta' and the 'Gerusalemme Liberata,' Prof. Solerti wishes to appeal to the English literary world for such assistance as it may be in the power of any one who owns portraits or MSS. of the poet to give him. Five portraits that are known to have existed in Italy in the last century cannot now be traced.

Any communication on the subject will be gratefully received by Prof. Angelo Solerti, 22, Via dell'Indipendenza, Bologna, or by W. M. KENWORTHY BROWNE.

THE ENGLISH ANCESTRY OF WASHINGTON.

[Paris, 128, Rue La Boétie, Champs Elysées, June 11, 1894.]

I AM greatly obliged to Dr. Egar for pointing out an error by which I was made to say that the Dymokes derived the Championship through the marriage of Sir John Dymoke to Margaret de Ludlow, daughter of Joane de Marmyon and Sir Thomas de Ludlow, instead of saying the granddaughter of Joane de Marmyon and Sir Thomas de Ludlow. But, if Burke be correct, Dr. Egar has also fallen into error in saying that Thomas de Ludlow was the grandfather of Margaret de Ludlow, and Sir Thomas de Ludlow her father, whereas the first was her father, and the second her grandfather.

Dr. Egar's reference to the Championship of England as being attached to the manor of Scivelaby was, in general terms, anticipated, first, by the words "His [Sir Thomas Windelbank's] wife was Frances, daughter of Sir Edward Dymoke of Scivelaby, co. Lincoln. By the tenure of his lands, Sir Edward Dymoke officiated at the coronation of Edward VI.," &c. Again, I give the inscription upon the brass to the memory of Anne Windelbank, wife of Henry Read, in the course of which the following words occur: "She was begotten of ye body of Frances Dymmock, of Sheerlaby [Scivelaby], in ye county of Lincoln, Knight, Champion to ye said Queen Elizabeth and her successors, by the tenure of his lands."

The letter of Canon Lodge also is most valuable. My mind was set upon tracing the descent of General Washington to the ancient house of Marmyon (from whom also descended the Rodes of Boarstall), "who," Burke says, "originally received from the Conqueror the manor of Scivelaby, to be held by grand serjeantry, to perform the office of Champion at the king's coronation." Burke, under "Marmyon," also remarks that "the Marmyons, it is said, were hereditary champions to the Dukes of Normandy, prior to the conquest of England."

What I had to say about the later generations of the Dymokes being Champions was, as Canon Lodge very justly supposes, simply given in a general way, as I was not acquainted with the present condition of the estate.

I look forward with lively interest to the publication of Canon Lodge's new edition of the Dymoke pedigree. My learned colleagues in genealogical research will readily understand that, having in my leisure moments during the last thirty-five years investigated the histories of hundreds of families, I should be more than human if I were not obliged to rely upon the kindness of friendly critics to correct errors into which I may have inadvertently fallen in covering so wide a field.

I am much indebted to the Athenæum for the information from the New York Nation and Virginia Historical Magazine, giving the name of the wife of George Reads, who emigrated to Virginia, as "Elizabeth, daughter of Captain Nicholas Martian." JOHN MEREDITH READ.

THE BIBLE OF ST. ANTHONY.

23, Tedworth Square, Chelsea.

ON a recent visit to Rome I was shown an illuminated manuscript Bible, which I promised to make known in England. It originally belonged to St. Anthony of Padua, and is a fine example of calligraphy displayed on the softest vellum. It is adorned by rich miniatures in a state of perfect preservation, and contains many marginal notes in St. Anthony's own hand. There is not, I believe, the smallest doubt as to its authenticity, and its records are easily accessible. I extract the following paragraph from De Azevedo's 'Life of St. Anthony of Padua,' a work published at Bologna in 1790:

"In the ancient dwelling of the Signori Corbelli of Castrocaro they showed me a room where, according to tradition, the Saint lodged while on his way from Monte Paolo to Forlì. Over the door there is the following inscription: 'In this room lodged the glorious St. Anthony of Padua when he passed through this town on his way to Forlì for the purpose of ordination. In this room the Saint beheld a heavenly vision, in commemoration of which he presented his own Holy Bible to his host's family. This sacred relic, which contains notes in his own hand, is here preserved for the benefit of the Saint's followers.'"

"This Bible," says De Azevedo, "has always been held in great veneration by the Corbelli family." On May 6th, 1778, Count Filippo Corbelli died, and, having no children, he bequeathed the said Bible to his cousin Signor Cesare Albicini. A copy of his will may be consulted in the archives of Bologna. I conclude this brief notice with an extract from a letter written by Signor Alfredo Tartarini, a professor in the Royal Institute of the Fine Arts at Modena, to the Director of the State Archives at Bologna:—

"Most willingly do I reply to your questions about the beautiful Bible formerly belonging to the Corbelli family, which I have lately had an opportunity of inspecting. I unhesitatingly affirm that I regard the miniatures by which it is adorned as of great value, not only because of their treatment, but also on account of their originality of design. These miniatures are in perfect preservation, and freshness, and I am confident that they are very valuable. I have, as you know, made a careful study of miniatures through long experience of ancient parchments."

This Bible is now to be sold by private contract, and those wishing to inspect it with a view to purchase, or to have further information, would do well to write, without loss of time, to Signor Carlo Malagola, Director of the State Archives at Bologna. RICHARD EDCUMBE.

'ENGLISH BARDS AND SCOTCH REVIEWERS.'

I own a copy of this work, the third edition, "Printed for James Cawthorn, British Library, No. 24, Cockspur Street. 1810." "Printed by T. Collins, Harvey's Buildings, Strand, London." The water-mark on sundry pages is "Smith & Allnutt 1816." The fifth line on p. 76 in this copy reads:—

But where fair Isla rolls her purer wave.

I find in note to line 56 "ingenuous." Line 350 reads:—

If 'chance come hard, though once by dunces feared.

There is no comma after "Bards" on p. 2. "Aberdeen" is correctly printed on p. 80; and on p. 83 "Postscript" is rightly spelt.

A SURREY LAD.

I HAVE four copies of this book which have the water-mark "E & P 1803" on three pages in each copy; of these being the genuine first edition I think there can be no doubt. For on comparing them with those copies which have no water-mark (I have two before me now) it is at once seen that the type (excepting the title-page, which is smaller) throughout is much larger, and the paper thinner and very inferior.

All six copies bear the same imprint, "T. Collins, Printer. No. 1 Harvey's Buildings. Strand." W. T. SPENCER.

PROF. W. D. WHITNEY.

THE alarming telegrams received in the early part of this month from the United States concerning the downward course of Prof. Whitney's illness had prepared us for the sad intelligence of his death which reached us last week. He expired at Yale College, New Haven, Conn., on the 9th of June.

William Dwight Whitney was born at Northampton, Mass., on February 9th, 1827; and four years after matriculating at Williams College, during which period he devoted all his spare time to the study of languages, he entered at Yale in 1849, and spent subsequently some years in the universities of Berlin and Heidelberg, to attend the lectures and enjoy the personal intercourse of Profs. Weber and Roth. In 1854 he was appointed Professor of Sanskrit at Yale, a chair which he filled till his death. In ancient Indian literature Vedic researches had from the very first a paramount attraction for him. In 1852 he brought out a tabular statement of the mutual relations of the various Vedic hymn collections, which by its lucidity and absolute trustworthiness earned for him high praise from competent authorities. In 1855 he commenced, jointly with Prof. Roth, the publication of an edition of the 'Atharva-Veda,' to which he added, in 1863, a scholarly edition of the 'Pratīkhyā' of that Veda. The translation of the Atharva hymns, on which he had been engaged for many years, was to go to press in the autumn of the current year.

His notes and other contributions to the Rev. E. Burgess's translation of the 'Sūryasiddhānta' proved him to be an excellent mathematician and astronomer; and in the literary controversies on such topics he could enter the lists against the most renowned scholars, and hold his own. In the department of Sanskrit grammar he achieved still greater successes. His work on the subject (1879) is the first attempt ever made at a presentation of grammatical facts on historical grounds. Whatever subsequent research in this direction may find to add, to modify, to correct, it will not take away a title of Prof. Whitney's merits as the founder of the historic-statistical method of Sanskrit philology. There is now a respectable and ever increasing band of Sanskrit scholars in the United States, all of whom have sat at Prof. Whitney's feet, and have made their mark in the several spheres of Sanskrit learning. In him they and the American Oriental Society have lost an ever ready and devoted guide. His various works on general philology—'Language and the Study of Language,' 'Oriental and Linguistic Studies,' 'Life and Growth of Language'—all bear the imprint of perspicuity, critical acumen, and mastery of details. As the author of 'Essentials of English Grammar,' and editor-in-chief of 'The Century Dictionary of the English Language,' he has done much for the cause of general education, not in his own country only, but wherever the English language is spoken.

Whitney was a stern but conscientious critic, especially in the field of Vedic interpretation, in which he was following his own independent lines; and he was most bitter and sarcastic, though never unjust, when he thought he had to deal with a disingenuous foe. His controversial essays, spread over a number of periodical and serial publications, are full of valuable grammatical observations, and should, together with whatever may have been ready for the press at the time of his death, be preserved in a collected form. Every educated American citizen was proud of owning Prof. Whitney as his countryman. The Philological Association chose him their first president, while in the American Oriental Society he successively filled the posts of librarian, corresponding secretary, and president. Among the numerous foreign academies and learned societies that enrolled him among their corresponding members may be mentioned the French Institute, and the Royal Academy of Berlin, at whose instance he was also created a Knight of the Order "Pour le Mérite." Many universities both at home and abroad also on various occasions conferred honorary degrees on him. But these recognitions of sterling literary work, gratifying as they must have been, were not calculated to divert him from the path of a single-hearted, modest, disinterested, and genial scholar, who had earned the respect and cordial affection of many a fellow worker also on this side of the Atlantic.

SALES.

MESSRS. SOTHERN, WILKINSON & HODGE sold a chosen portion of the library of Mr. Birket Foster on June 11th. The selection, though comprising only forty-five books, realized 1,850*l.*, thus bringing the extraordinary average of 41*l.* per lot. on June 13th from the library of Mr. Neville Rolfe: Holbein, Les Simulachres de la Mort, Lyon, 1538, 2*l.* Blomesfield, History of Norfolk, large paper, with extra illustrations, extended to 33 vols., 158*l.* Suckling, County of Suffolk, 1846, 10*l.* 6*s.* A volume of Engravings relating to Nelson, 78*l.* A series of seven volumes containing a collection of Norfolk Portraits, 200*l.* A volume of Suffolk Portraits, 81*l.*

On Tuesday, the 19th inst., Messrs. Puttick & Simpson disposed of the books, MSS., autograph letters, and literary collections formerly the property (most of them) of Thomas Astle, Deputy-Keeper of the Records in the Tower, viz.: Morant, History of Essex, with additional plates and MS. notes, 14*l.* 10*s.* Collection of Original Holograph Correspondence, in 17 vols., 125*l.* Collection of Original Letters relating to the American Colonies, 1660 to 1768, 216*l.* A volume of Autograph Letters from Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others, 50*l.* Visitation of Essex (1630 to 1636), 15*l.* 10*s.* John Taylor, Unpublished Poems, 3*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* Original Charters, 8*l.* 4*s.* Oliver Cromwell, Autograph Letter, with signature, 8*l.* J. L. Motley, Private Correspondence with Prince Bismarck (nine letters, 1866 to 1872), 60*l.* The total amounted to 654*l.*

Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods sold on the 19th inst. the following books belonging to various owners: Shakespeare, Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies, the third folio, 1664, 435*l.* R. Hakluyt, Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques, and Discoveries of the English Nation made by Sea or Overland, 3 vols. in 2, black-letter, 1599-1600, folio, 375*l.* Claude le Lorrain, Liber Veritatis, 300 plates, after originals by Earlom, 1777-1804, folio, 27*l.* Turner, Liber Studiorum, frontispiece and 70 plates, folio, 88*l.* The Ibis, from the commencement in 1859 to 1891, 34 vols., 49*l.* Zoological Society's Proceedings, from the commencement in 1830 to 1887, 44 vols., 47*l.* Dresser and Sharpe, History of the Birds of Europe, 8 vols., 4to., 1871-81, 39*l.*

A NEW "BALADE" BY CHAUCER.

To save trouble, I propose to call the Balade which I lately printed in the Athenæum by the name of 'Womanly Noblesse.' These words occur in line 25; they also occur in 'Troilus,' i. 287.

I am sure I am very sorry that I claimed the discovery of this Balade, as it seems it was already well known. Let those who found it claim it, by all means. It was, however, wholly new to myself. As it is known that I am engaged in editing Chaucer, it would be a great kindness to me to give me any recent information in connexion with him or his works.

I cannot understand the difficulties that are raised. They do not consist with the facts. I notice some of the supposed objections.

1. In l. 20, lo is thought to be otiose. Rather, it emphasizes neich. It so happens that Chaucer is extremely fond of lo. Lo here occurs four times in four successive lines of 'Troilus,' bk. v. 1849-52. There are many examples of its use to fill up a line:—

And seyde, O mercy, god, lo, which a dede!—T. iv. 1231.
And whanne, alas! by god, lo, right anon.—T. iv. 1219.
Swich fyn bath, lo, this Troilus for love.—T. v. 1636.

Especially in the 'House of Fame,' where it is sometimes quite otiose; see lines 593, 667, 865, 932, 936, 955, 957, 1022, 1269 (a bad case), 1341, 1429, &c. It is quite absurd to rely on such a test as this.

2. We are next told that ful chose, in l. 8, is un-Chaucerian. It is perfectly right. Ful means "fully," and can be used with a past participle. Precisely parallel is ful drive (not the modern "full-drive"), where drive is short for driven, precisely as chose is for chosen. It occurs in the 'Cant. Tales,' F. 1230. And in Boethius, v. pr. 3, 138, we find ful y-pressed, i.e., fully appraised. How then can this be used as a test?

3. Then, in l. 7, herte is, apparently, monosyllabic; and this is used as a test. But let us consider. It is easy to use a slight pause, or second caesura, after herte; and the very faintest hint of a pause suffices for Chaucer to treat the word as an apparent monosyllable. Prof. Child gave some examples from the 'Cant. Tales' long ago: see B. 4005, E. 1237, F. 212, to which I can add another from 'Mars', 185: "Therfor my herte for ever I to hir hette." The frequent use of herte as a monosyllable is a fair test; but a single example of it furnishes no test at all.

The ascription of the Balade to "Chaucier" (for such is Shirley's spelling) rests upon Shirley's authority. Since in other cases his authority is justly considered as being of some value, there is no reason for rejecting it in this particular instance.

I cannot go into the question of metre; it will be time enough to do that when any parallel example can be found. As far as I can see, the objections are individually, and therefore collectively, valueless; and I fail to understand why they have been raised.

Literary Gossip.

IN our number for July 7th we intend to publish a series of articles on the literature of the Continent during the past twelve months. In these Belgium will be treated of by Prof. Fredericq; Bohemia by M. V. Tille; Denmark by Dr. A. Ipsen; France by M. Joseph Reinach; Germany by Hofrath Zimmermann; Greece by Prof. Lambros; Holland by M. Taco de Beer; Hungary by M. L. Katscher; Italy by Commendatore Bonghi; Poland by Dr. Balcikowski; Russia by M. Milyonkov; and Spain by Don Juan F. Riaño.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN is engaged on an article on Lord Coleridge, which will appear in the pages of an American magazine.

INCREASED attention seems to be given to the discovery at Delphi of marble slabs containing fragments of hymns to the Delphic Apollo with a musical notation written above the words. Mr. Swinburne has made a metrical translation of the fragments, which will appear in the Nineteenth Century for July.

THE conference, of which Prof. Ramsay is the convener, to consider the proposals of the Gresham University Commission, will meet on the 30th inst. in the hall of the Royal College of Physicians. All the colleges concerned in the plan have agreed to send deputies, and it is expected that both the Senate and Convocation of the University of London will be represented, though they are officially at a deadlock, as the Consultative Committee of the latter, which was hostile to the Commissioners' scheme, has broken up without having yet been regularly superseded.

A RESOLUTION expressing general approval of the scheme will be submitted, but it is not likely to be carried without material reservations. It is felt that the proposed Statutory Commission ought not to be tied, as it is by the report, to a single solution, which may break down under the difficulties which we have already noticed in connexion with the constitution of the Academic Council. If the terms of reference are wisely enlarged the Government may possibly succeed in carrying a Bill to establish the Statutory Commission before the end of the session.

THE July number of Blackwood will contain an article on 'Senoussi, the Sheikh of Jerboub,' the recluse head of the great religious movement which has for years past been making slow but silent progress in Northern Africa, and penetrating even into the Soudan, the Senoussi's followers accepting him as the expected Mahdi. In the same number will appear an article on the 'Memorials of Old Haileybury,' by Sir Auckland Colvin, who writes with personal knowledge on the short but brilliant records of that training ground of distinguished Anglo-Indians. Sir Herbert Maxwell contributes an article on behalf of the Wild Birds' Protection Bill, with which he has so closely identified himself; and Prof. Blackie has a congenial theme in 'Place-Names of Scotland,' throwing light on the influence of Gaelic.

MR. JOHN JACOB ASTOR recently published in New York a scientific romance, entitled 'A Journey in other Worlds: a Romance of the Future,' which is said to have had a certain amount of success. Messrs. Longman & Co. are preparing a new and revised edition for the English market, and hope to publish it early in July.

AN important holograph letter of Oliver Cromwell to his son Richard, written in 1658, will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby next month; also a very interesting letter from his son Henry, written when Governor of Ireland, referring to his retirement, with a holograph draft of the same letter, that he evidently drew up before he sent the fair copy.

MR. JOSEPH FOSTER is about to resume his genealogical undertakings on a more elaborate scale than he has ever yet attempted. The completion of his labours in connexion with the University of Oxford has set him free to prepare a whole series of volumes, in which he is being assisted by the best heraldic artists. As a further incentive to improvement in heraldic art, he announces a prize competition for amateur designs in the mediæval spirit. It is his hope to found a British Genealogical Society, for the mutual intercourse of genealogists, of which his rooms at Cambridge House, Shaftesbury Avenue, are to form the headquarters.

THE third volume of the Historical MSS. Commissioners' report on the Duke of Portland's family papers, edited by Mr. Richard Ward, will shortly be issued. It will consist entirely of extracts from the correspondence of members of the Harley family down to the year 1700, about the time when Robert Harley was first chosen Speaker. Among many letters of interest in the collection will be found some from Sir Edward (afterwards Lord) Herbert of Chisbury, and one only from his brother George, the poet; and many from Brilliana, the wife of Sir Robert Harley, much of whose correspondence preserved elsewhere was printed by the Camden Society some years ago. Her sons Robert and Edward held commands in the Parliamentary army in the West, and the letters to and from them supply many new details of events in the Civil War. There are also a few lively letters from Andrew Marvell to Sir Edward Harley on public affairs in 1677.

THE Trustees of the British Museum will issue shortly the first volume of the 'Arabic Printed Books in the British Museum,' by Mr. A. G. Ellis, M.A., assistant in the Department of Oriental MSS. and Books. The plan followed in the work is, on the whole, similar to that of the 'General Catalogue,' and the first volume, of nigh upon 500 pages, will contain about 9,000 entries, and cover the literature from A to L. It is well known that the Museum is very rich in copies of early Arabic books printed in Europe, and all Arabic scholars will be grateful to the Trustees for the complete list, which, beginning with the 'Seven Canonical Hours' of the Greek Church, printed in Arabic type at Fani, A.D. 1514, ends with the last lithographed work printed in Bombay in 1894. The second volume will contain full indexes of titles and subjects, and a supplement.

A NEW and revised edition of Mr. S. R. Scargill-Bird's invaluable 'Guide to the Principal Classes of Documents in the Public Record Office' is being printed by Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode. The original issue met with a ready sale, and is now out of print.

THE library and reading-room of the Royal Irish Academy will be closed from July 9th to July 21st, both days inclusive.

MR. EDWARD DICKY's work on Bulgaria, where he has recently been residing for some months, will, we understand, be entitled 'The Peasant State.' It deals mainly with the political and economical conditions of a very interesting country.

THE death of Madame Agenor de Gasparin is announced. The Countess's best-known work was 'Les Horizons prochains.' She also wrote 'Vesper,' 'Le Mariage au point de vue chrétien,' &c.

FRITZ REUTER's widow, who died at Eisenach on June 9th, outlived her husband nearly twenty years. He died July 12th, 1874. Her self-sacrificing devotion to him in his sufferings, and his passionate affection for his "Lowising," are known from his own writings. The villa at the foot of the Wartburg, which was presented to him in 1864, and where he spent the last ten years of life, was dear to his widow for both reasons. Again and again since Reuter's death she has refused to sell it, though large sums have been offered for it, on account of its splendid situation. She has, it is said, bequeathed the house and all its contents to the Schillerstiftung.

MR. HENRY T. THOMAS, publisher, of New York, is preparing for publication a large subscription work, to be entitled 'Men of the Century.' It will consist of one hundred short biographies—each by a different author—of the Americans most eminent in war, statesmanship, science, and literature, and will be illustrated by portraits executed in colour, and other pictures.

WE hear with regret of the death of Mr. Virginus Dabney at New York, on June 2nd. Mr. Dabney, who was in his fifty-eighth year, was a native of Virginia, and some of the characters and characteristics of that State are represented in his remarkable novel 'Don Miff.' In November last Mr.

Dabney was appointed Deputy Collector of the port of New York.

A WELL-KNOWN bookseller has sent us the following amusing entry in the sale catalogue of the library of the late Mr. R. Montgomery, which was dispersed by auction at Antwerp the other day:—

"Plain or Ringlets? by Alfred Tennyson, Poet Laureate, with illustrations by John Leech. London, s.d., 8° d. rel. dos et coins chagr. rouge, tête dorée, figg. coloriées et noires."

MRS. TREGASKIS is going to open an interesting exhibition of bookbinding next Wednesday, and meanwhile has issued a catalogue with nice illustrations. Some of the bindings figured are excellent; but unluckily a German one has been made the frontispiece which is objectionable both in design and colour—to judge by the illustration.

A NEW edition of Chitty's 'Statutes,' superintended by Mr. J. M. Lely, the editor of the reprint of 1880, is to be brought out in twelve volumes or so by Messrs. Sweet & Maxwell.

CONSTANTINOPLE is not one of the places expected to be frequented by English governesses, but the small community there has established a home for them, to which 180*l.* was last year contributed, and which was visited twenty-eight times by English and five times by Americans.

WE have received a short letter from Dr. Brockelmann regarding our strictures on his 'Lexicon Syriacum' (Athen. No. 3474). Naturally enough, those characteristics of his work which seem to us defects appear to him merits. We fear discussion would hardly lead to an agreement.

THE Parliamentary Papers this week include Education, England and Wales, Report for 1893 for the East Central Division (2*d.*); and Education, Scotland, Reports for the Southern, Western, and Northern Divisions for 1893 (3*d.* each); Ordinances made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners as to Parliamentary Grants, Salaries, &c. (1*d.*), and as to Libraries and Museums (1*d.*); and Report on Strikes and Lock-Outs for 1892 (3*s.* 3*d.*).

SCIENCE

POPULAR SCIENCE.

The Story of our Planet. By T. G. Bonney, LL.D., F.R.S. (Cassell & Co.)—The announcement that Canon Bonney was engaged in preparing a general history of the earth was one calculated to arouse sanguine expectation. That it would be a scholarly production was certain, and that it would be well illustrated was probable. It is almost needless to add that both anticipations have been amply verified. 'The Story of our Planet' is indeed a sumptuous volume, in which will be found a singularly perspicuous exposition of the principal facts of physical geography and dynamical geology and of the present state of geological thought. Being addressed to the general reader, the work has the full advantage of the author's clear and incisive style, unmarred by the controversial acridity which sometimes distinguishes his more technical papers. By carefully avoiding the unnecessary use of scientific terms Prof. Bonney has succeeded in making the outlines at least of some of the most complicated problems plain to all. He has not stooped to mere popular writing—such lapses as a joke at p. 513 associating Stegosaurus with the victims of the late Dr. Bushy's educational zeal, or as "The Proletariat of Nature" as the heading to a chapter on lowly animal and vegetable rock-builders and rock-destroyers, being commendably rare—and his work gains thereby in dignity. On the other hand, it cannot be said that he has reached the sustained elevation of style of Lyell's immortal 'Principles,' with which he in his preface somewhat unwarily suggests comparison. Considering Dr. Bonney's long-continued investigations in petrology, it is disappointing to find so little of detailed statement respecting the methods of this comparatively recent class of research. The microscope now frequently checks and corrects the inferences of the field-geologist, and probably no one better than the author could have explained to non-geological readers how this is done. We are also surprised that so experienced a narrator should, in telling his "Story," have so sparingly alluded to those pioneer observers whose labours have rendered its relation possible. A touch of human interest, of great value in securing the sympathy of the reader, is thus unquestionably lost. To treat of glacial action without once mentioning Agassiz, of the problems of the North-Western Highlands without naming Lapworth or Nicol, of the inner constitution of rocks without saying a word of Sorby, or of the succession of organic remains in the stratified deposits without naming William Smith, is deliberately to rob the study of geological progress of one of its greatest charms. Dr. Bonney refuses all such aids; he gives the names of those authors whom he actually quotes, and that is all. In another particular the probable tastes of his readers do not appear to have been sufficiently considered. Fossils, in which so much of the popular interest in geology is naturally centred, are decidedly neglected. One chapter only is devoted to them, and that the most sketchy and least completely illustrated. There are, moreover, signs of haste or carelessness in this portion of Prof. Bonney's book, such as, for instance, the reference of fig. 167 (an excellent, and therefore unmistakable, figure of the triassic Encrinurus liliiformis) to the Jurassic genus Apicrinurus. Such slips are very rare in the previous chapters, and such as occur—e.g., "A mine at Weardale in Northumberland"—are not likely to mislead any one of common education. The illustrations—though many of them have already appeared in some of Messrs. Cassell's serial publications, such as 'Science for All'—are most of them very good indeed, some of the plates being perfect triumphs of colour printing.

Our Secret Friends and Foes. By P. F. Frankland, F.R.S. (S.P.C.K.)—The thanks of a large class of readers will be given to the author and the publishers of this little book, which forms an addition to the "Romance of Science" series of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The title may not suggest the matter immediately to all who hear it, but nevertheless it is appropriate and well chosen. Dr. Percy Frankland is a well-known and acknowledged authority on bacteriology, and the author of much original and highly important work on the subject. He gave in 1892 a series of Cantor Lectures at the Society of Arts on the 'Chemistry and Bacteriology of the Fermentation Industries,' and in addressing large and critical audiences in Edinburgh and elsewhere he has spoken of our secret friends and foes; by expansion of notes of these lectures this work has been obtained. In his work on the micro-organisms Dr. Frankland has been ably assisted by his wife, to whom he gracefully dedicates this little volume, certain of the plates in which are from her pencil. The great importance to all men of some knowledge of the habits of the low forms of life known as microorganisms or germs need not be insisted on, though nearly all our accurate knowledge of their behaviour has been gleaned within the last quarter of a century. Yet already we know that the power for good or evil of some of them is almost incalculable. Of course, Dr. Frankland is thoroughly at home in his subject, and writes generally in very clear and simple language, to be well understood by readers of the romance of science; but now and then we think he has left a sentence more adapted to a critical and advanced audience. After a general introduction to micro-organisms and the way in which they can be stained and examined, we are made acquainted with some of the micro-organisms in air, micro-organisms in water, useful micro-organisms, and malignant micro-organisms; and the concluding chapter is on the theory and practice of prevention in disease. Rightly Dr. Frankland often introduces examples and illustrations from his own work in studying these interesting organisms; but the reader is also made familiar with some of the marvellous discoveries of Pasteur, the devices of Tyndall and Hesse, and some of the work of Dr. Koch, of Hansen, of Warrington, Winogradsky, Heliogel, Kitaato, and others. He is shown how the number of microbes in a given volume of air can be measured, and how few there are in the air on a mountain, or even on the top of a cathedral, as compared with the number in a crowded railway compartment, or in the air at a soirée of the Royal Society. The number of colonies of micro-organisms found in one cubic centimetre of unfiltered Thames water, and the number in the same amount of water as supplied by the London water companies during every month in the year, are given in a table, and show how very efficient in freeing the water from organisms is the method of filtration adopted. For comparison results obtained from the waters of a few deep wells are given; these are almost free from micro-organisms. Among the useful organisms are mentioned the yeasts, the vinegar organism, the nitrifying organisms of the soil, and the nitrogen-fixing bacteria found on the roots of leguminous plants. Here also the power possessed by certain microbes of distinguishing between isomeric sugars or other physical isomerides is pointed out. The secret foes selected for notice are the anthrax bacillus, the Streptococcus streptococcus—which, however, may occasionally be a friend—the tuberculous bacillus, the tetanus bacillus, and the spirilla of Oriental cholera. The chapter on "Prevention in Disease" is specially worth attention; in it is told how some of the injurious microbes elaborate, when growing in the body, or even, under favourable conditions, when outside it, poisonous chemical substances which act in a very intense and rapid manner: to this poisoning by decomposed fish, mussels and the like, is due. The typhoid and the tetanus bacilli produce chemical poisons of this kind. The results of inoculation for small-pox, chicken cholera, anthrax, and hydrophobia are noted; and, finally, Metchnikoff's theory of leucocytes and phagocytosis is explained in a simple and lucid manner. The power of modifying the characters of bacteria by cultivation, and the power of educating them to attack some special enemy, are alluded to as of the highest importance in connexion with the problems of evolution, besides leading to possibilities of the utmost importance to the human race. Truly the romance of science is not lacking. This book deserves, and we feel sure will meet with, a large sale, and its readers will be both delighted and instructed. It is illustrated with forty-eight woodcuts.

Louis Agassiz: his Life and Work. By C. F. Holder, LL.D. (Putnam.)—This little volume forms one of the series of "Leaders in Science": it is naturally founded on the biography by Mrs. Agassiz, and may be recommended more particularly for boys of naturalist tendencies. It contains a useful Agassiz bibliography.

The Romance of Electricity. By John Munro. (Religious Tract Society.)—This is a collection of electric marvels in nature and in art. Remarkable instances of lightning, fireballs, and St. Elmo's fire are given, with full references to authorities, and excellent illustrations. Some artificial electrical glows are then described, special prominence being given to the experiments of Crookes and Tesla. Very full information is given about electric fishes; and the chapter on the telegraph contains a great variety of particulars respecting creatures whose ravages are destructive of submarine cables and of land telegraphs. Interesting anecdotes about telegraphy are also to be found. The materials have been collected with much care and judgment, and will to a large extent be novel to most readers.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

THE FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT OF PROF. COPELAND, Astronomer Royal for Scotland, speaks chiefly of the satisfactory progress which has been made with the construction of the new observatory on Blackford Hill. A new reduction of the Edinburgh astronomical observations has been undertaken, and an investigation made of the errors of the transit instrument. The service for the distribution of time has been carried on as heretofore at the old observatory on Calton Hill. A bifilar pendulum of extremely sensitive construction, on a principle suggested by Lord Kelvin, was temporarily mounted there on March 24th, the object being to indicate the minutest change of level in the foundation to which it is attached. Prof. Copeland proposes shortly to commence a series of systematic observations in conjunction with one to be made by M. d'Abbadie nearly on the same meridian in the south of France, which will show whether any appreciable tilt takes place at the same time at both stations.

The Report of the Kew Committee (registered on February 9th, 1893, as the "Incorporated Kew Committee of the Royal Society") for last year has been published. The work has been on the same lines as in preceding years. The new superintendent, Mr. Chree, commenced his duties on May 16th, and the Committee desire specially to record the efficiency with which the work was carried on in the early months of 1893 under the charge of Mr. Baker, the chief assistant.

The Report of Mr. Tebbutt's Observatory at the Peninsula, Windsor, N.S.W., for the year 1893, recently received, shows that there has been no relaxation in the work of that establishment. Its main efforts are directed to the observation of lunar occultations, of comets visible in the southern hemisphere, and of the meteorological instruments. Although not coming within the year 1893, it may be mentioned that Mr. Tebbutt secured a good series of observations of the comet (ii. 1894) discovered by Mr. Gale at Sydney on April 1st, the first of which was made on the 3rd of that month.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—June 14.—Lord Kelvin, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were admitted into the Society: Mr. W. Bateson, Mr. O. A. Boulenger, Prof. H. L. Callendar, Prof. W. W. Cheyne, Mr. R. E. Froude, Mr. A. E. H. Love, Mr. F. O. Penrose, Dr. D. H. Scott, Rev. F. J. Smith, Mr. J. W. Swan, and Mr. V. H. Veley.—The following papers were read: 'Flame Spectra at High Temperatures: Part II, The Spectrum of Metallic Manganese, of Alloys of Manganese, and of Compounds containing that Element; Part III, The Spectroscopic Phenomena and Thermo-chemistry of the Bessemer Process,' by Prof. Hartley.—'The Complexity and the Dissociation of the Molecules of Liquids,' by Prof. Ramsay.—'The Molecular Surface-energy of the Esters, showing its Variation with Chemical Constitution,' and 'The Molecular Surface-energy of Mixtures of Non-associating Liquids,' by Prof. Ramsay and Miss E. Aston.—and 'On a Method of determining the Thermal Conductivity of Metals, with Applications to Copper, Silver, Gold, and Platinum,' by Mr. J. H. Gray.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—June 13.—Mr. C. R. Markham, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Dr. J. R. Jeaffreson, Messrs. E. H. Barton, W. H. Jessop, W. Le Queux, and A. J. B. Tapling.—The paper read was 'Survey of the English Lakes,' by Dr. H. R. Mill.

ASIATIC.—June 12.—Mr. E. L. Brandreth, Treasurer, in the chair.—Mr. Beveridge read a paper 'On the Khalasat at Tawārikh, or Essence of History, of Nujān Rai of Patiala.' He remarked that the book was written two hundred years ago, and was interesting as being, perhaps, the earliest and the best historical work by a Hindu. Sir Henry Elliot had accused the author of plagiarism, but probably the so-called 'Makhtam-at-Tawārikh' was an early draft of the 'Khalasat,' or a plagiarism from it. If the 'Khalasat' was a plagiarism, it was a fortunate one, as the alleged original had entirely disappeared. Prof. Dowson had described the author as writing like a bigoted and intolerant Mohammedan, but, in fact, there was not a trace of bigotry or intolerance in the work. On the contrary, the writer was remarkable for the liberality of his religious sentiments, and had been praised by M. Garcin de Tassy for his impartiality. He was certainly a Hindu, but his mind had been enlarged by association with Mohammedans. Probably he was a Sikh at heart. The paper noticed the valuable geographical information in the work and the writer's art in telling a story, and suggested that he might be described as the Indian Herodotus. The first part of the book had been rendered into Urdu by Sher Ali Afso, but with additions and omissions that were not always improvements. Sher Ali's work had been translated into French by the Abbé Bertrand, and into English by Capt. Court, but it was desirable that the original work should be published in its entirety. This had been recommended by Col. Leas, who had also suggested that part of it should be translated into English.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—June 7.—Sir A. W. Franks, President, in the chair.—This being an evening appointed for the election of Fellows, no papers were read.—The President exhibited and presented four volumes of original drawings of seals.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Rev. G. A. E. Kempen, Messrs. E. J. Poynter, W. Morris, P. W. Ames, J. A. R. Munro, J. L. Myres, A. J. King, W. D. Caros, H. B. Walters, W. L. Nash, W. Ravenscroft, and G. Saiting.

June 14.—Viscount Dillon, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. Hudd exhibited a silver medalet with portraits of Nicholas and Dorothy Wadham, and an English fifteenth century reliquary or locket with figure of St. Katherine.—Dr. C. March read a paper on the date of Dun Angus.—Prof. Hughes exhibited and described a selection of horncores and skulls illustrative of the origin of breeds of English oxen.—Mr. Somers Clarke read a paper on the methods used in making and ornamenting an Egyptian rock-tomb by successive gangs of workmen, each of whom executed a particular section of the work.—Mr. W. C. F. Anderson gave an account, illustrated by lantern slides, of the excavations on the site of a Roman town at Doclea, in Montenegro, carried out last autumn by himself, Mr. Munro, and others.

STATISTICAL.—June 19.—Sir R. W. Rawson in the chair.—Mr. W. J. Harris read a paper 'On a Comparison of the Growth of Wealth in France and England, also of their Economic Conditions, specially with Reference to their Agricultural Systems, and their Position in case of War.'

METEOROLOGICAL.—June 20.—Mr. R. Inwards, President, in the chair.—Mr. R. H. Scott read a paper 'On Fogs reported with Strong Winds during the Fifteen Years 1876-90 in the British Isles.' Out of a total of 135 fogs, 108 were associated with cyclonic and 27 with anti-cyclonic conditions. The majority of the fogs occurred with south-westerly winds and with temperatures very close to the maximum for the day.—Mr. R. H. Curtis read a paper 'On some Characteristic Features of Gales and Strong Winds.' After calling attention to the unsatisfactory state of anemometry, and after describing the "bridled" anemometer at Holyhead, Mr. Curtis stated that the greatest force of an individual gust which he had met with was registered in December, 1891, and amounted to a rate of 111 miles per hour, which with the old factor would be equivalent to a rate of about 160 miles per hour. Gusts at a rate of 90 to 100 miles per hour have many times been recorded, but the usual limit for gusts may be taken to equal about 80 miles per hour, which on the old scale would be equivalent to about 120 miles per hour. Gales and strong winds differ in character very much; and as the result of a prolonged study of their general features as recorded by the bridled anemometer, the author has been able to group them into three general classes. He then described those gales which are essentially equally in character, in which the gusts constitute the main feature of the gale. In an average gale the ordinary gusts follow each other at intervals of about ten to twenty seconds, while the extreme gusts occur at the rate of about one per minute. Another class of gales are those in which the velocity of the wind is tolerably steady. In the third class are gales which appear to be made up of two series of rapidly succeeding squalls—the one series at a comparatively low rate of velocity, the other at a much higher one, the wind force shifting rapidly and very frequently from one series to the other. Mr. Curtis also stated that on looking carefully over the anemometer records he had not unfrequently found distinctly marked a prolonged pulsation in the wind force which recurs again and again with more or less regularity, of, perhaps, twenty minutes or half an hour in some cases, and in others at longer intervals of about an hour more or less.

MATHEMATICAL.—June 14.—Mr. A. B. Kempe, President, in the chair.—The following communications were made in abstract by the Secretary: 'The Solutions of Two Differential Equations (Hyperbolic Sine and Cosine Functions),' by Mr. F. H. Jackson.—'A Theorem in Inequalities,' by Mr. A. E. Johnson.—'Some Properties of a (Tucker) Circle,' by Mr. R. Tucker.—'Note on Four Special Circles of Inversion of a System of "Generalized Brocard" Circles of a Plane Triangle,' by Mr. J. Griffiths.—and 'On the Order of the Eliminant of Two or More Equations,' by Dr. E. Lachlan.—Impromptu communications were then made by Prof. Greenhill, Dr. J. Larmor, and Dr. M. J. M. Hill.—At the subsequent special meeting, amongst other business, authority was given to the Council to effect the proposed incorporation of the Society under section 23 of the Companies Act, 1867.

PHYSICAL.—June 8.—Prof. A. W. Rücker, President, in the chair.—Prof. Ramsay, in opening the discussion 'On Experiments on the Relations of Pressure, Volume, and Temperature of Rarefied Gases,' by Mr. E. C. C. Baly and himself, recapitulated the chief points in the paper.—Owing to the absence of Capt. Abney, the 'Exhibition of Photographs of Flames,' which had been announced, was postponed.—A paper 'On the Isothermals of Ether' was read by Mr. R. Innes.

HELLENIC.—June 18.—Annual Meeting.—Prof. Jebb, M.P., President, in the chair.—The Secretary read the Council's Report, which showed the position of the Society to be eminently satisfactory. Besides the usual publication of the Journal of Hellenic Studies, the Society had in the course of the year renewed the annual grant of 100*l.* to the British School at Athens, and had made other grants for excavation and exploration in Asia Minor and in Alexandria. Important additions had been made to the library, and the loan collection of lantern slides had also been expanded. The general meetings had been so well attended that the Council had decided to raise their number from four in a session to six. The receipts of the year amounted in all to 1,084*l.*, the expenditure to 922*l.*, a balance of 214*l.* being carried forward at the end of the financial year, as against 259*l.* carried forward last year. Forty-eight new members had been elected, thirty-four had been lost by death or resignation, the total now being 709.—In moving the adoption of the Report Prof. Jebb took occasion to refer to some of the more important achievements of the year in the field of Hellenic studies. The discoveries of the French School at Delphi had been of great interest, and even greater promise. The treasure house of the Athenians, built shortly after the defeat of the Persians at Marathon, had been found, and the sculptures had proved to be most important examples of archaic art. In the walls of the temple of the Pythian Apollo had been discovered an archaic statue of the god which, as compared with the types known from Orchomenus and from Thera, presented a marked Egyptian character. The archaic colossal head of the Naxian sphinx had also been found. But no discovery had excited greater interest than that of marble slabs containing portions of a hymn to the Delphic Apollo, with a musical notation written above the words. The fragments were fourteen in number, and in one passage the musical notes were all but complete. The letters which indicated them were those of the ordinary Greek alphabet, and the key had been given by the Greek writer Olympios in the time of the Emperor Julian. The instruments used had been the lyre and the flute, and the vocal music was in unison. Performances of the hymn had been given first in Athens, but more recently in London and in Cambridge. In Athens, Dr. Dörpfeld had discovered the site of the fountain known as En-neakrounos. Outside Greece important researches had been made in Cyprus under the direction of the authorities of the British Museum, from funds bequeathed by Miss Elizabeth Turner. Among the publications of the year one of the most important had been that of Prof. Furtwängler's Meisterwerke der griechischen Plastik, which had thrown much fresh light on the history of Greek sculpture in the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. Prof. Armitage Robinson had had the unique privilege of examining the MSS in the library of St. Sophia at Constantinople, but had, unfortunately, found no Greek MSS there. In conclusion, Prof. Jebb referred to the following members of the Society, who had passed away during the year, viz., Lord Bowen, M. Waddington, Sir W. Smith, Mr. T. Wood (of Patras), and Mr. C. Jenner.—In seconding the adoption of the Report, Mr. E. Gardner, Director of the British School at Athens, acknowledged the services rendered to the School by the Hellenic Society, not only by the annual grant, but still more by the facilities given for the publication of results in the Journal of Hellenic Studies.—The Report was unanimously adopted.—Mr. Gardner then read parts of an article on recent archaeology in Greece, which will appear in the next number of the Journal.—The President and Vice-Presidents were re-elected, Prof. Bywater and Dr. Sandys being added to the latter in the place of Dr. Freshfield and Prof. Foote. Mr. J. W. Headlam, Sir H. Howorth, Mr. M. R. James, Mr. H. S. Jones, and Mr. W. C. Perry were elected to vacancies on the Council.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

Mon. Institute of British Architects, & Presentation of the Royal Gold Medal to Sir P. Leighton.

Tues. Statistical Soc.—Annual Meeting.

Science Gossip.

THE second part of the Royal Society's Catalogue of Scientific Papers (vol. x. of the whole series) for the years 1874 to 1883 has appeared after much delay.

M. E. LEFÈVRE, President of the Société Entomologique de France, died the other day at the age of fifty-five. He was one of the first entomologists in Europe, and also a distinguished botanist.

FINE ARTS

A Mound of Many Cities. By F. J. Bliss. (Palestine Exploration Fund.)

UNDER the above title Mr. Bliss gives an interesting account of the excavations which he carried out at Tell el Hesay, the supposed site of Lachish, for the Palestine Exploration Fund. The excavations were commenced in 1890 by Prof. Flinders Petrie, and they were continued during 1891–2 by Mr. Bliss, who has described the results he obtained in clear, modest language. The results, though of great archaeological importance, are somewhat disappointing, for they do not supply any direct evidence that the mound is the site of Lachish, and, excepting the clay tablet with an inscription in cuneiform, few articles of value or interest were found.

Many centuries before Christ an unknown people, possibly Amorites, founded a town sixteen miles east of Gaza, on a bluff 60 ft. above the torrent-bed now known as Wady el Hesay. The town, constructed of sun-dried bricks, as buildings have been in the East from the earliest times, was for some cause abandoned. The mud houses fell to pieces, and streets and rooms were alike filled with fallen earth. On the ruins of this city another was built, and so, during the course of centuries, town followed town until there was a mass of ruin 60 ft. high. Then the site was finally abandoned, and centuries of wind and rain converted the vertical series of towns into the mound called by the Bedawin Tell el Hesay.

Mr. Bliss cut down one-third of the mound, layer by layer, and about 750,000 cubic feet of earth and rubbish were systematically removed and carefully examined. The mode of excavation adopted was well calculated to secure accurate results, and the system of offering bakhshish for all finds seems to have counteracted any tendency to petty theft. Mr. Bliss's descriptions of his work and of the men and women who worked for him are decidedly pleasant reading. With the Bedawin and the fellahin, no less than with the representative of the Porte, he was on the best of terms; and he has shown an aptitude for excavation which must be highly gratifying to the distinguished explorer under whom he served a short apprenticeship.

Mr. Bliss considers that the mound contains the remains of eleven cities; and he dates the first settlement as early as B.C. 2000, and the final abandonment of the site between B.C. 400 and 300—a period indicated by the absence of coins and other late objects. About midway in the Tell is a bed of ashes, 3 ft. to 7 ft. thick, which appears to extend over its whole area, and to form a marked line of separation between the six cities above and the five cities below it. Immediately beneath this bed was found a small tablet of hard burnt clay resembling, in size and shape and in the forms of the cuneiform characters inscribed upon it, the tablets discovered at Tell el Amarna. None of the articles associated with the tablet or found below its level is later than the eighteenth dynasty, so that the city in which it was discovered may with some certainty be dated at about B.C. 1450. The importance of this find can scarcely be exaggerated, for the tablet not only dates the pottery and other articles found with it in the mound, but it confirms the opinion, expressed many years ago by Prof. Sayce, that inscribed tablets of pre-Israelitish Canaan lie buried beneath the soil of Palestine. On the tablet a certain Zimrida is twice mentioned, who may possibly be identical with the Zimridi, Governor of Lachish, one of whose despatches to the Egyptian Pharaoh was found at Tell el Amarna.

Without entering into a discussion of the dates assigned to the several cities by Mr. Bliss, we may mention that in the two earliest, pottery of a well-marked type and copper or bronze tools were found. An analysis of the tools by Prof. Gladstone showed that they contained no admixture of tin, and indicated that the makers were aware of a process by which they could harden their copper so as to make it a good cutting instrument. Above these cities there is a distinct change in the character of the pottery: Phœnician pottery first appears, and with it were found fragments of pottery resembling the finest Egyptian ware of the Tell el Amarna period.

In the first two cities above the bed of ashes much Phœnician pottery, some of a good type, was found, associated with eighteenth and nineteenth dynasty scarabs, a cylinder with twenty-second dynasty glazing, and a fragment of a plate (fig. 194) with three Phœnician letters, which Prof. Sayce considers cannot be older than the eleventh century B.C. From the same cities came a scarab (fig. 115) with characters supposed to be Hittite or badly formed Egyptian hieroglyphs; and the only ornamented stone work uncovered—a pilaster (fig. 114) in low relief, terminating in a volute, which has a striking resemblance to, though more archaic than, the pilaster unearthed at Jerusalem by Sir C. Warren ('Recovery of Jerusalem,' p. 89). In the fourth city above the ashes was found the fragment of a neck of a jar (fig. 197), inscribed with four Phœnician letters, which Prof. Sayce and M. Clermont Ganneau consider to be of pre-exilic date. Above this city iron objects are common, and there is much of the polished red and black Greek ware which is known to range from B.C. 550 to B.C. 350.

There seems good reason to suppose that Tell el Hesay is the site of Lachish, but, unfortunately, nothing has been found which enables us to identify the city destroyed by Joshua, that fortified by Rehoboam, or that of which the siege by Sennacherib is so graphically represented on the Assyrian slabs in the British Museum. Possibly the city immediately below the bed of ashes is that destroyed by Joshua, and Mr. Bliss's City VI. the one besieged by Sennacherib.

'A Mound of Many Cities' is well illustrated, and there are useful appendices containing Prof. Sayce's translation of the tablet; Dr. Gladstone's analysis of five of the metallic objects; Prof. Day's notes on the bones, teeth, and shells; and Mr. Spurrell's report on the flint implements found. The book would have been improved if a sketch map showing the position of Tell el Hesay had been added, and if the "finds," with their levels, had been given in a tabular form.

Mr. Bliss has shown that he can carry out excavations on scientific principles, and describe clearly what he finds. We have no doubt that the excavations which he has lately commenced at Jerusalem will be conducted in an equally satisfactory manner, and we hope that they may be attended with even more important results.

BUT for the enterprise of Mr. J. B. Muir we should not have thought it was worth while to have a Descriptive Catalogue of the Engraved Works of J. P. Herring, Senior. Mr. Muir knew better than we, and he has vindicated the British Empire against Redgrave in the 'Dictionary of Artists,' which called Herring "the son of a Dutchman" (Redgrave was not incapable of humour), and 'The National Biographical Dictionary' (sic), which describes him as "the son of an American," meaning that his father was born in New York. Happily, however, it turns out, Mr. Muir says, that on August 12th, 1795, the clever painter of horses was born in Blackfriars. Mr. Muir's enthusiasm is worthy of high praise, and sportsmen ought to be immensely indebted to him for his catalogue as well as for the lists, which follow it, of pictures exhibited by Herring at the Academy, British Institution, Suffolk Street, and the Portland Gallery.

THE NEW GALLERY.

(Second and Concluding Notice.)

THE landscapes—a few of them landscapes with figures more or less important—have still to be noticed, and we may begin our remarks with Mr. J. Charles's Evening on the Arun (No. 11), a clear and bright picture, somewhat like a Constable, and representing, with appropriate harmonies of tone and tint, a white cliff facing the sun, a placid river, and much lush herbage, the naturalistic treatment of which contrasts with the eclectic, not to say monumental mood of Mr. F. Dillon's Evening at Stonehenge (9). Mr. Charles is one of the ablest of our rising landscapists, and, like Mr. Dillon, he often imparts to his works those touches of pathos at which 'Evening on the Arun' aims but indirectly. In The Old Chalk Pit (78), for example, it is as direct as it is expressive. That work is, in fact, a broadly and sympathetically painted study of evening light, glowing in a huge white hollow, and simple enough to be epical.—In Afternoon Sunlight (13) Mr. C. W. Wyllic has painted a vista of a canal, numerous boats, and old red-tiled houses and other buildings as they are seen in the strong, lurid light of a spring evening while the deep local colours, black, purplish hues and dingy reds, are harmonized with the sky and olive and grey water. A strong, but by no means interesting picture of nature, this work will probably attract less attention than its merits deserve. Full-toned, distinct with colours of a sadder kind, their strength and veracity bring these pictures into accord with the powerful brilliance and resplendent hues which are conspicuous in A Bright Morning after a Breeze (18), by Mr. Henry Moore, where the almost amethystine surges, surcharged with light, are driven before the wind under the lingering impulse of a recent gale. The charm of Mr. Moore's picture is enhanced by the dignity of the cloud masses overhead and the treatment of the sea as a whole; indeed, the waves are drawn with the solid precision of sculpture.

In The Morning Light (23) is a serene idyl of Mr. E. Parton's devising—a tender and harmonious view of a quiet stream, bordered by tall, graceful aspen beautifully drawn. But its silvery warmth is its most conspicuous merit. The visitor will be sure to enjoy the purity and repose of the same artist's The Gorbio Valley, Mentone (124).—Mr. I. Hetherington's Aylesford on the Medway (28) is bright and modest.—No. 32, Mr. W. Llewellyn's Late Autumn Afternoon, Whitby, is a sympathetic study in sun-flushed mist of a scene which Mr. A. W. Hunt has painted even more tenderly and subtly. As a whole Mr. Llewellyn's picture inclines to paintiness; still the treatment of St. Mary's Church and the grand convent ruins, looming through the luminous haze, is fine and just, broad and simple.—The somewhat nebulous treatment of No. 32 differs from Lord Carlisle's crisp and emphatic touch, his love for good drawing and assured modelling, which are to be seen both in the solid, dignified, and careful Castle of Jodhpore (34), a rock-fortress placed on high amid hill-tops, and in Bambro' Castle (260).—Mr. M. Lindner's nocturne in blue and silver, embroidered with sparkling lights, a misty moonlit view of Sleeping Waters, St. Ives Bay (36), is a good example of that aspect of nature for the discovery of which and of its paintableness the world is greatly indebted to Mr. Whistler.—The charm of Miss A. Alma Tadema's fine picture of the Evening Star (58) is not to be resisted by lovers of nature. This young lady excels in rendering the exquisite gradations of the light and colour of the air. Almost equally charming is her picture of The Rising of the Lark (148), in which the bird soars high above the floating white cloud and pierces the blue air that, being flushed with the gold of the sunlight, is transmuted into green. The lark himself seems to us (although that may be a necessity of the subject) a good deal too big.

Mr. W. Logsdail's Il Ponte Storto, Venice (92), is, like his pictures at the Academy, undeniably solid, well drawn, rich, and full of colour. For the same qualities we like The Adam and Eve Angle of the Doge's Palace, Venice (121), a subject so renowned through Mr. Ruskin's writings that, during the flowering time of his popularity, countless hosts of young ladies and gentlemen valued these rude if spirited sculptures and their architectural accompaniments above the Parthenon. It was a happy time, a time of noble delusions, the result of sincere, if half-taught and illigical fancies. Early Morning, Venice (131), the well-known view of the Doge's Palace and the canal in front of it, is full of silvery and pearly light. Luminous and pure, it is the most lightly touched and refined of all the painter's works that we have seen. In fact, his improvement in these respects is wonderful.—The Arno Fishing Hut (98) of Mrs. R. Corbet, a river view, with an expansive distance full of colour, is a capital piece of work. By the Wood (115), by the same painter, is a solemn and expressive landscape. The sky is luminous, and there is much good colour.—Mr. R. Corbet's contributions are masculine and artistic; for instance, his Sunset (100), a powerful rendering of the fiery glow seen between the stems of darkling trees. The picture as a whole is noteworthy for its strong colour and tone. Another contribution of Mr. Corbet's, A Morning Study (103), is a beautiful illustration of the converse effect. In fact, it is a highly artistic representation of a woodland side where dark trees rich in colour stand sharply out against the clear blue sky and its rosy clouds. The painting of the foreground is particularly brilliant, and, in despite of its strength, quite harmonious.—The Rose (101) of M. Fantin-Latour is, as most of his works are, artistic in all respects, admirable in grouping, deftly touched and sound in colour, and fit to be employed as an example of chiaroscuro. Nearly as good is No. 112, representing a group of various roses in a glass, the title of which is

With whose sweet smell the air shall be perfumed.

Tagetes Patula (156) is another fine work by M. Fantin-Latour.—Mr. G. Wetherbee's An Autumn Morning (132) is a charming rendering of nature just after dawn, and distinctly inspired by a choice and "classic" motive. It is very broad, simple, and pure; but still better is the larger picture conspicuous in the North Room, entitled In the Dawn of the Year (229), a delightful idyl in silver and pearly hues. All its fine elements, especially that "classic strain" to be admired in 'An Autumn Morning,' unite in exalting 'In the Dawn of the Year' to the first rank among this season's landscapes.

Mr. Herkomer's Nomads (140) is a large landscape, painted in a manner which reminds us very unpleasantly of Mr. J. W. North's unfortunate treatment of similar subjects. It is hot, weak, and exceptionally thin. It has, however, some better elements, for its style is large and there is sterling pathos in two large figures walking painfully in the road. These are the nomads of the title, a stalwart matron in rusty garments, worn by vice and toil, and her sick and footsore son, a lad of twelve or thereabouts. The faces are excellent and touching in different ways.—The Drummer-Boy's Holiday (149), by Mr. R. T. Waite, is an expansive view of the South Downs in warm evening sunlight, and it is painted in the manner of the old English landscapists who followed De Loutherbourg. Its solidity, breadth, firm and crisp touches, exhaustive draughtsmanship, and simple naturalism, and even its conventional, old-fashioned style, are directly opposed to the pretentiousness and easy-going dippancy of Mr. Herkomer, and are highly creditable to a studios artist.

Prof. Costa, as our readers are well aware, is the founder of a school, and his poetic landscapes have proved a source from which more than one artist of distinction in this country and abroad has derived much. Without losing their individuality, George Mason and Frederick Walker were more or less in his debt, and so, obviously enough, is Mr. Corbet. The professor was never more delightfully represented than by his three choice idyls which really adorn this gallery. The first of them is The Port of Astura (153), an historic site, now represented by an inlet in a low cliff filled with a placid sea, and, so to say, saturated with the subtlest charm of repose and the light of Claude. It is a lovely, yet sober piece of colour, full of harmony and a noble sense of the graces of line and tone. Even zealots for Claude may admit that 'The Port of Astura,' being free from artifices, is more to be coveted than many a mannered Claude. The same tribute of admiration is due to A Dream of Rest (175), a picture of pearly sunlight of the loveliest sort, rich in pure colour, and instinct with harmonies in tone that are in themselves idyllic. Its composition, too, is distinguished by grace and reposeful beauty. Hardly less delightful is Where the River meets the Sea (191), a study of the sentiment of twilight to which the incident of the lesser water losing itself in the greater, of itself imparts an appropriate charm. In fact, it may be called a sort of elegy for the death of a day. In its refined and undemonstrative way this beautiful picture excels as a composition, in its coloration, and in its tonality.

Mr. A. T. Nowell's Light at Eventide (165) is harmonious, bright, and full of light and colour.—The Morning Sun (181) of Mr. A. East suffers a little, as his works often do, from an excess of paint, otherwise it is a sympathetic and choice study of the effect of dawn upon an English landscape.—The Dawn (184) of Mr. Adrian Stokes is an idyl of another and a very homely sort, and a powerful rendering of the sun-flushed air above a cultivated plain. The breadth of an almost shadowless effect, the splendour of an almost sullen glory, and the fine gradations of a vast and cloudless atmosphere find adequate and robust representation here. The painter's Cow in a Copse (72), although a respectable picture of nature, is commonplace compared with this.—The Landscape (193) of Mr. W. Padgett is a capital sketch (in a good style characterized by breadth and vigour) of the effect of rainy evening.—The Forecast of Christmas (188) of Mr. R. W. Macbeth reminds us of other pictures of his of a cider country. Brilliant and pure light, and wealth of colour, distinguish the representation of the interior of a straw-littered shed at the time of making cider. One of those very ripe and buxom girls whose charms Mr. Macbeth has immortalized attends to the press, while a man works the handle of the wheel. It is a capital picture, yet luminous, broad, and powerful as it may be, its comparative slovenliness is not significant of any great devotion to his art on the author's part.—Mr. A. Lemon's Staten Cattle (200) marks him out as a sort of English Luminist; the figures are good, and the landscape is appropriate and broadly painted.—Tender and pretty is Mr. J. Amonnier's Hayfield at Amberley (204).—A powerful landscape is to be found in Mr. A. Parsons's Lovely Farm (210), a potato field and old buildings that catch the glow of sundown, while the warm yet pallid full moon rises slowly.—We notice with pleasure in this exhibition the following works in oil and water colours, which, although praiseworthy for various reasons, do not call for special remark: Mr. L. L. Brooke's "I was ever a Fighter" (221), a man-at-arms in armour; Lady Lindsay's artistic and richly coloured study of flowers, Carnations (225); Mr. Holman Hunt's hard, yet brilliant, solid, and vivacious portrait of H. Rathbone, Esq. (234); Mr. Peppercorn's bright and true landscape On the Cornish Coast (240); Mr. B. A. Forbes's By the Fireside (245); Mr. H. Hardy's

A Partridge Drive (351); Mrs. Drew's Entrance to Boscaille Harbour (271); Mr. P. Burne-Jones's Sunset (289); Mr. C. P. Knight's Down the Valley of the Lynn (294), a noble natural composition; Mr. T. C. Gutch's Roby (346); the Marchioness of Granby's refined and pure drawings of Miss N. Bourke (349) and Captain the Hon. M. Bourke (352); and Mr. A. Hughes's "You cannot barre Love out" (377).

Among the sculptures in the Central Hall we may single out as deserving of special admiration Mr. G. Simonds's highly poetical statuette of the Goddess Gerd—the Northern Aurora (417), drifting upon the northern breeze, so as to suggest the tremulous radiance of the aurora borealis, which the Scandinavians took to be the fiery hair of this divinity. The body and arms are beautifully modelled; so, too, are the lower limbs, but the legs appear to us much too long. By the same sculptor is a fine Italian Head of a Lady (416).—We admire likewise Mr. J. W. Swynnerton's Love's Chalice (420), a capital group forming part of a picturesque fountain that has been designed in good taste and executed with extreme skill and care; Miss A. M. Chaplin's Watty, the Queen's Pet (430), a dog; Mr. Onslow Ford's highly spirited and artistic General Gordon and Camel (446); and Mr. G. Frampton's Caprice (447), the plaster original of which we have seen before.

NEW PRINTS.

Among the best things of its kind is the delicate, low-toned reproduction upon wood, by Mr. W. Biscoombe Gardner, of Mr. Watts's portrait of 'Mr. George Meredith,' which is now in the New Gallery. Mr. Gardner is his own publisher at Thirlstone, Hind Head, Surrey, and Messrs. Mathews & Lane of Vigo Street are his London agents. The block is 8½ in. by 12 in., and gives all that can be desired of the character, expression, drawing, and modelling of the fine picture we admired in Regent Street.

That the Germans do not take kindly to chromo-lithography is a fact forced upon all who have witnessed the failures of the Arundel Society to procure at a cheap rate prints in colours from Berlin. The Society has been dreadfully angry with us—indeed, we have been denounced from the chair at general meetings in Bond Street, because we really could not give praise to these prints. We are glad, therefore, to say that the last print issued by the Society not only shows that our criticisms were justified, but that in Paris chromo-lithography accomplishes what seems impossible in Berlin. It is, though a little flat and thin, a clear, luminous, soft, and warm transcript by M. Lemerrier—with most of the qualities of the original, excepting its polished modelling—of 'The Marriage of the Virgin,' painted by Pietro Perugino in the choir of S. Girolamo, near Spello. Apart from its proper qualities, it is very interesting to us because it shows in two or three of the girlish bridesmaids' faces the very type to which Raphael was partial, and which he often painted, doubtless from his master's model, as in the 'Madonnadel Gran Duca' in the Pitti, the Orleans Madonna, and 'La Belle Jardinière,' all of which were painted before 1508. The forms of Maddalena Doni's face are traceable in this type of visage, of which Perugino was so fond that it might well be named after him, as he clung to it much longer than his pupil did. Mr. Malcolm's silver-point 'Head of the Virgin,' by the latter, now in the British Museum, is evidently a study from the fair maiden in question.

From the Art Union of London we have received an artist's proof of a plate etched by Mr. R. Macbeth after Mr. H. W. B. Davis's smaller picture at the Academy in 1892, called 'Summer Time.' Although a little spotty and too black in the shadows, it is acceptable as a print of a sound picture.—'The Surrender of the Garrison of Huningue' is the subject of a highly characteristic work by M. E. Detaille, very fortunately reproduced in goullgravure, and published by MM. Boussod, Valadon & Co. We have a remarque proof, with the signature of a dismounted cannon. From the same publishers we have received ten of their pretty and acceptable "Estampes Miniatures," being reduced versions in goullgravure of capital pictures, members of a series which has worthily attained to a high number. Differing modes of kissing the mistress and the maid are amusingly illustrated by M. Delort's 'Devant' and 'Derrière,' which aptly suit the series.—Mr. F. G. Stevenson etched and Mr. H. J. Brooks painted a rather lifeless and scattered design of Eton boys in the 'Entrance to School Yard.' Photography of some sort has been employed to reproduce a rather dull design by the same painter, called 'Eton—Field—School of Old Etonians.' Messrs. Dickinson & Foster are responsible for these works, about the art of which there is not much to say.

THE SALONS. (Fifth Notice.)

THE portraits painted by M. Aman-Jean at the Champ de Mars (Nos. 22-27) depict the frail and delicate envelopes of shy and pensive souls. Around them all is silence and retirement; the sad tints, the sober details of the furniture, the severity of the costumes, the mystery of the veiled daylight, harmonize in a delicate and, as it were, subdued symphony. There is in all these revelations of lives very austere and very noble much evident sincerity; the art and the thought, the painting and the idea, unite in an accord so intimate that one yields without a struggle to their somewhat morbid charm.

And it is also by a charm of intimacy, of retirement, of interior life, that the portraits of M. Lerolle (727) and M. R. Ménard (786) please at the Champ de Mars. Among the most attractive by their youthful and penetrating grace, I ought to mention a portrait of a young woman by M. Kroyer (866). She is standing on the seashore (she wears a saffron robe) on the beach of Skagen, in the enchantment of one of those long summer twilights that you wot of. She has paused to enjoy the ineffable charm of the hour, and the light envelopes her from head to foot with a soft caress. Her delicious profile, her gown, of a light stuff, bound closely to her figure by a yellow ribbon, the hat of yellow straw, which she holds in her hand, are gently exalted against the unending background of blue sea. She is seen in a sort of halo of tenderness and harmony. It is truly a plenitude of charm, in which all nature, the softness of the damp atmosphere, the peaceful splendour of the sky, the caressing and modest conceit of the blue waves, unite in a loving and pure apotheosis. The art of the painter, whom one feels to be equipped with all the resources of modern impressionism, has simplified, modified, enlarged, softened, and in its frame of sky and ocean the portrait remains intimate as a confession.

M. Dagnan-Bouveret has desired to make a portrait of Madame Bartet, of the Comédie Française (324), a sort of apotheosis. He has seated her with a flower in her hand, wearing a dress of sombre iris, secured to the figure by a golden band, in the foreground of a nocturnal landscape in which are shadowed the Pont des Arts, the outlines of the Stn. Chapelle and Notre Dame—the décor of Paris, of which she is the queen; and in this effigy of ardent grace—as in the portraits of a young woman in a ball dress (318), of a Breton Marchande de Cierges (319), and of a young painter his pupil, M. Meunier (322)—he has introduced a singular mixture of unrest and of will, and all those qualities of precision, finesse, and force which make of him, at this moment, one of the most interesting masters, and one of the most worthy chiefs of the young French school.

It goes without saying that the masters of the craft have exhibited: M. Bonnat (Portrait du Prince de Monaco, No. 225) and M. Lefebvre (very lovely Portrait de Mlle. G. H., No. 1116) at the Champs Élysées, M. Benjamin-Constant, Aimé Morot, Baschet, Carolus-Duran, &c.; but it is superfluous to dwell on the details of works which teach us nothing new concerning any one of them.

As to the foreigners, I need only mention a portrait which has been much noticed and which has obtained a most signal success—Sir Walter Gilbey, by Mr. Orchardson (Champs Élysées, 1399). For the minute, unflinching notation of all the peculiarities of the individual resemblance, it is impossible to dream of anything better than this image, where the execution (precise and intentional, and absorbed by little incisive touches) thrusts before the eye, accumulates, and condenses the characteristic verities of the description and almost of the biography. An inscription on the frame informs us that Sir W. Gilbey has rendered great services to the national industry of horse-breeding: we could have guessed it.

The portraits by Messrs. James Guthrie (581-582) and Alexander (15-21) at the Champ de Mars, M. Jean de la Housse, of Brussels (940-941), and Mr. Fox, of Australia (759), at the Champs Élysées, have also been deservedly appreciated. As to M. Chartran, two years ago he painted Leo XIII. as a diplomatist; this year he has depicted at the Champs Élysées M. Carnot (416) as a martyr, sitting with an air of resignation beside his work-table covered with big volumes, and fingering in a melancholy manner a voluminous register in which he is not reading, while he seems to be lost in a sad sort of dream. Leibnitz said that "all that speaks in the soul of Caesar is represented in his body." If M. Chartran is to be believed, no great thing goes on in the soul of M. Carnot.

ANDRÉ MICHEL.

A GNOSTIC GEM.

Kilmuir Castle, May 30, 1894.

In the Athenæum of April 28th Mr. Seymour Conway describes an amethyst intaglio, and invites explanation in regard to its design and inscription; the former, "a lizard (or crocodile) walking with a small lizard (or crocodile) on its back"; the latter, three lines in what he surmises to be "the so-called 'Sabellio' alphabet." It seems to me hardly doubtful that the gem is one of those commonly termed Gnostic, some of which are religious συνήματα or tokens, some mere amulets, while others serve in either capacity. Though representing the views of numerous early sectarians, who variously blended together Christianity, Judaism, Mithraism, and several paganisms, these gems bear to one another a strong general likeness. Their designs are most frequently Egyptian in type, almost universally their legends are in Greek capitals (usually square), and they furnish a text (often designedly unintelligible) which in general seems to be Coptic, or otherwise of some Semitic language, sometimes, in either case, strangely mingled with Greek. Both in text and design the present gem exhibits characteristics similar to those I have sought to indicate.

1. Design.—From rudeness of workmanship the details on gems of this class are often hard to identify. I have not seen the present gem, but it seems probable that the "small lizard (or crocodile) on a lizard's (or crocodile's) back" is, in fact, a frog, standing on a crocodile, though the lizard itself is a not uncommon device.* In my own rather large collection of Gnostic gems I find two somewhat similar in subject to the gem under view, and evidently connected in idea: (1) an amethyst bearing on it a winged frog, seated on a lotus, which rises from a crocodile's back; and (2) a crystal, engraved with a dragon carrying on its back a winged frog; the legend, in both cases, ΙΑΡΒΑΘΑ ΓΡΑΜΜΗ ΙΒΑΩΧ ΝΗΜΕΩ. The letters are the usual square Greek capitals, and, as is most usual, read directly from the stone.

The symbolism in all its fulness forms a subject too large for present discussion, but I may briefly state that the frog is held to be a type of the resurrection to a higher life beyond the tomb, and that the crocodile and lotus are special attributes of the sun-god Horus, to whom most of the talismanic gems appear to have been consecrated. The dragon is the evil ruler of the world, the devourer of the soul not imbued with knowledge (Γνώσις), or, more generally, the great principle of evil. The resurrection and deliverance of the enlightened soul, therefore, and its conveyance to the upper regions through divine power, would seem to constitute the subject of such gems as these. Sometimes, no doubt, like others of the Gnostic class, their symbolism and language were designedly ambiguous, so that at critical times the semi-Christian owner might assign the token of his secret brotherhood to Horus, Serapis, or Mithras, instead of to Christ.

2. Inscription.—Contrary to the usual practice, this (according to the diagram) is cut reversed on the amethyst, as if meant for a seal. Reading it as it would show in an impression, and dividing the words, the text stands thus:—

PV BEKE VBE TO TOV ΘΕΩV
ONOMA OCI

The first line appears to be in Coptic, a language with which, unfortunately, I have but small acquaintance. Consulting Tattam's 'Lexicon,' we find that BEKE signifies μισθός, merces, reward. This word occurs as the sole legend on one of my own gems (on plasma), where it accompanies the presentation to Isis of a kneeling worshipper by Anubis, the guide of souls through the perilous paths of Amenti. The idea of reward is also embodied in the common Gnostic legend ΒΑΙΝΧΩΩ (Βαί, premium certaminis), "Reward—secret—honour," inscribed on gems that probably were the tokens of a victorious endurance of initiation tests and trials. We may, therefore, not unreasonably separate the letters that form BEKE, and assign to that word the sense of reward.

PV and VBE are too difficult to determine. PV signifies idem, and among other meanings Po signifies mihi. Ουβη denotes ad, adversus; Ωβια, propinquus. Oci is a remarkable word, which signifies "ζημία, damnum; λύτρον, redemptionis pretium"; it might likewise be viewed as an abbreviation of the divine name Osiris.

The Greek TO TOV ΘΕΩV ONOMA needs no explanation. To illustrate the use of 'Ονομα, I may cite the legend on another of my gems (an eagle grasping a serpent—protective against storms and lightning): ΕΥΟΝΟΜΑ ΙΟΝΑ ΥΧΕΡΡΕΙ ΒΑΛΒΕΟΙΠΤΩ—which also illustrates the blending of languages on these talismans. The jingling sound of Πυβη-νεβη is another characteristic peculiarity; compare (in my collection) Ασκι-κατασκι, —Γιγαντο-παντο, —Αθαραμ-θαραμ-αραμ, &c.; compare also the mediæval charm-word Abracadabra, corrupted from the Gnostic Αβλαβαβαλβα, "Thou art my Father."

In illustration of several of the peculiarities of the present and other Gnostic gems, I may refer to a gem figured in Matter's valuable work ('Hist. du Gnosticisme,' vol. iii., pl. ii.B, fig. 6), whereon the Christian cross is exhibited with the encircling legend ΟΣΙΡΙΣ (ΟΣ above I, to the left; Π above ΙΣ, to the right, so that on a cursory view the word reads ΟΣΠΙΣ—which would have no meaning). In gems of a later date Osiris appears as a man, with streams of the water of life (or of blood and water) flowing from his sides (King, 'The Gnostics,' p. 106). In the same work (p. 206) Mr. King cites two Gnostic legends exemplifying the use of the word 'Ονομα—META TO ONOMA TOY MON ΘΕΟΥ, and META TO ONOMA TOY CΑΡΑΙΙC (Serapis).

If, apart from talismanic uses, a conjecture might be hazarded regarding the spiritual meaning of the legend on the present gem, I should suggest that it either expressed its owner's desire to be rewarded by salvation through the name of God the Redeemer—"the price of redemption" (or, alternatively, of Osiris), or his boast that he sought no other reward than to bear the name of that divine being—recalling the Mithraic initiatory formula, when the neophyte cast to earth a crown and a sword, exclaiming, "Mithras is my only crown." The design on the obverse, as I have sought to show, would harmonize with these readings of the legend, for it figures resurrection to life through the aid of an all-potent god. SOUTHERN.

A MYCENÆAN SYSTEM OF WRITING IN CRETE AND THE PELOPONNESE.

Candia (Heraklion), Crete, April 26, 1904.

I HAVE just returned to this place after a journey of archaeological investigation in Central and Eastern Crete, the results of which will, I think, be of general interest. The wider object that I had in view was to hunt up the Mycenaean and primeval remains of the island, and in this quest I was rewarded beyond my expectations and even beyond my hopes. Crete, indeed, may be said to swarm with remains of the Mycenaean period, and a six weeks' search, accompanied by somewhat arduous travel, has been sufficient to obtain a knowledge of relics and remains which throw some entirely new lights on the art and religion of the Mycenaean peoples. But on the present occasion I cannot even attempt a summary account of the more general results of my exploration, which include the discovery of two prehistoric cities, as I wish to confine myself to the more special object that I had in view. The special object of my quest was the outcome of a previous find made during a visit to Greece in the spring of last year. On that occasion I came across some small three- and four-sided stones, perforated along their axis, on which had been engraved a series of remarkable symbols. The symbols occurred in groups on the facets of the stones, and it struck me at once that they belonged to a hieroglyphic system. They were, however, quite distinct from Egyptian in character, and though they seemed to show a nearer approach to the Hittite series, it was evident that they belonged to an independent system. My inquiries resulted in tracing these curious stones to a Cretan source; subsequently, thanks to the kindness of Dr. Furtwängler, I was able to obtain impressions of some similar specimens in the Museum at Berlin, presenting symbols which fitted on to and supplemented the symbols I had already obtained. In this case, too, the source of the stones, as far as it was known, turned out again to be Crete. The impression of a gem taken at Athens some years since by Prof. Sayce supplied another piece of evidence; and I found that an unclassified stone in the Ashmolean Museum, which had been brought back by Mr. Greville Chester from Greece, and noted by him as having been found at Sparta, presented symbols belonging to the same series as the others. The evidence as a whole, however, distinctly pointed to Crete as the principal source of these hieroglyphic forms, and I therefore resolved to continue my investigations on Cretan soil.

At Candia I obtained a certain clue which led me to examine more particularly the eastern part of the island and the land which to the borders of the historic period was still inhabited by the Eteocretes, or indigenous Cretan stock, a fragment of whose language in archaic Greek characters has, in fact, been preserved to us in an inscription found on the site of Procon. On this site, and again from the "Palaeokastro" in the neighbourhood of the ancient Itanos, I was so fortunate as to procure two hieroglyphic stones, and I subsequently obtained three more from the same region. Two others found in the same part of Crete are now in the Polytechnicon at Athens; but although the evidence thus points to this eastern region as the principal source of these stones, they are by no means unknown in other parts of the island, and, amongst other localities, I succeeded in obtaining one from the site of Knosos.

The total result of my investigations hitherto has been to collect over eighty different symbols. It is difficult to give an idea of many of the types without adequate illustrations, but the following objects may be enumerated among those represented:—

The human eye.
A bent arm with expanded fingers.
A bent arm with curved instrument.
Two arms crossed, with open palms.
A human leg with bent knee.
A single and double axe.
A dagger.
A club or sceptre.
An arrow head and other uncertain implements.
A spouted vase and another with a high beak.
Trellis-work or fence.
A door or gate.
A ship.
A primitive lyre (apparently developed from a horn bowl).
The head of a wolf with his tongue hanging out (also Hittite).
Deer-horns.
The head of a bull, of a goat, and (apparently) of a bird.
A pig and a kid.
Birds.
Fish, perhaps tunny.
The jaw of an animal.
Stars of four, eight, and revolving rays.
A double crescent.
Two concentric circles with central dot.
An S-shaped symbol.
Floral and vegetable forms derived from lily, &c.
Loop and knot-like symbols, crosses and other geometrical designs.

There is no question here of the mere copying of Egyptian hieroglyphs by workmen ignorant of their true signification, as in the case of a well-known class of Phœnician objects. Neither have we here to do with the adaptation of Hittite symbols. Although, as was to be expected, certain objects represented in the Cretan stones—such as the eye and leg, the single axe, and the heads of certain animals—are common to the Egyptian or the Asiatic systems, the whole character of the present series shows that it is, in the main at least, of independent development. Certain fixed principles, moreover, are observable in the arrangement of the symbols in the several groups. Some objects are only found at the beginning or end of the columns. Others occur in the same juxtaposition on different stones. We have here to do with a very different class of objects from the merely supplemental figures found in the field of certain Mycenaean gems of lentoid or amygdaloid form, gems which, as we now know, served the purpose not of seals, but of ornamental beads worn round the wrist or neck. In the case of these gems the objects in the field are inserted as the space left by the principal design suggests, and are simply due to the horror vacui of primitive art. But there is every reason to suppose that the faceted stones with their regularly arranged groups of symbols served the purpose of seals, and were, as it were, the angular contemporaries of Babylonian cylinders.

The form of the three-sided perforated stones goes back in Crete to a very early period, and certain gems of this form with rude designs, which must be regarded as the immediate precursors of the "hieroglyphic" series, belong to the age which immediately preceded the development of the typically Mycenaean art, and which in Aegean archaeology may best be described as the "Period of Amor-gos." The remains of this period—including the primitive marble idols that characterize the Amorgos deposits—are well represented in Crete. A very interesting series of objects of this class recently found at Phaeston, and evidently representing the contents of a small group of tombs, have been deposited in the extremely interesting little museum that Cretan patriotism has founded at "Heraklion." Amongst these I noticed some indications of the highest chronological importance, the presence, namely, of several Egyptian scarabs belonging to the twelfth dynasty, and, as a terminus a quo in the other direction, a painted vase, the technique of which showed that it was more or less the contemporary of the vases of Thera. The data thus supplied indicate roughly 2500—1800 B.C. as the period covered by the Phaeston deposits, and among them occurred some triangular steatite gems of the kind which I have already indicated as the immediate predecessors of those presenting the hieroglyphic symbols. In some cases, indeed, what appear to be the most primitive examples of the symbols themselves are found on stones belonging to this early period. On the other hand, there is distinct evidence that the fully developed class of hieroglyphic seals comes well within the limits of the Mycenaean period of Cretan culture. This is borne out by the occurrence of a more globular variety of the triangular stones with Mycenaean figures, and the further existence of a peculiar class of stones, the back of which has a spiral convolution, the outgrowth of a double-shell ornament of the "Amorgos period," on which symbols belonging to the present series alternate with purely Mycenaean designs.

But this Mycenaean system of writing passed through another phase besides the more pictographic stage with which I have been hitherto dealing. On some of the three- and four-sided stones of the class described the symbols take purely linear forms, though their shapes can in some cases be clearly traced to their pictorial prototypes. I have procured stones with inscriptions of this class from Prasos and the Siteia district, but they are by no means confined to this eastern region. Another was found on the site of Knosos, and linear characters of the same class occur beneath a characteristically Mycenaean engraving of an eagle, on a remarkable amethyst jewel of heart-shaped form, also found at Knosos. And, in the case of these quasi-alphabetic forms, I have been able to trace the extension of the system to other objects and materials. Whilst exploring the ruins of the prehistoric city of Goulae, which in extent and preservation far surpass those of any other city of the Mycenaean world, a most remarkable piece of epigraphic evidence came across my path. A peasant who had a little cultivated patch immediately below the walls of the northern acropolis pointed out a spot where he had recently discovered close together three ancient relics, which he handed over to me. One was a Mycenaean intaglio of cornelian, the chief design of which was a two-handled cup, the copy, no doubt, of a golden original. The second was a terra-cotta ox of a type common in late Mycenaean deposits throughout the island, and approximately dating from the tenth century B.C. The third object was a clay cup of the same period, exhibiting a graffito inscription of three alphabetic characters. From a village near this site I obtained a vase with two more graffito symbols belonging to the same system; one of them the double axe-head of the hieroglyphic series reduced to a linear form.

Nor is it only on seals and ceramics that this early system of writing makes its appearance. On a bronze double-axe I found engraved a linear reduction of the dagger symbol of the hieroglyphic series. Certain symbols had already been observed, by Mr. Stillman and others, on the gypsum blocks of a prehistoric building on the site of Knosos, which may or may not have been the "labyrinth" of classical tradition, but which, from the painted fragments found in some of its chambers in the course of a partial excavation by Mr. Minos Calocherinos, of Candia, unquestionably belongs to the best period of Mycenaean art, and approximately, as is shown by the strikingly similar fragments found by Mr. Petrie in the palace of Khennaten, to the fourteenth or fifteenth century B.C. Of these symbols, which have been set aside as mere masons' marks, I made a careful study, and find that, though there need be no objection to describing them as "masons' marks," the marks themselves, like those on the Phoenician walls of Eryx, are of alphabetic character, and fit on to the same system as those on the pottery and seals. In several cases, indeed, they occur not singly, but in groups of two, and here again the double axe-head reduced to linear form plays a prominent part. One feature I noticed of especial interest—the occurrence, namely, of a symbol which may be described as a square with three prongs, identical with one that recurs on one of the two vase-handles presenting mysterious signs found in Mycenae itself. I do not hesitate to say that these Peloponnesian examples fit on to the same (probably syllabic) system as the Cretan.

In another direction these early alphabetic forms of Crete find some equally striking parallels. Several of them recur among the signs on the potsherds found by Prof. Petrie at Gurob in a deposit assigned by him to the period of the twelfth dynasty, and again at Kahun amongst eighteenth dynasty relics. The Cretan evidence, indeed, supplies a remarkable confirmation of Mr. Petrie's views as to the extremely early date of some of these symbols. As already stated, the relics from the prehistoric graves of Phaeston show that already in the days of the twelfth dynasty there must have been a direct contact between Egypt and Crete. The earliest of the triangular stones with hieroglyphic signs belong to this period, and among the Phaeston deposits there occurred a green steatite of perforated and rudely whorl-shaped form, presenting characters so remarkably alphabetic that it is difficult at first sight to believe in their extreme antiquity. They are, however, accompanied by a rude design of an animal, executed by the same hand as the linear signs, which unquestionably belongs to a very archaic period of Cretan art. From Siphnos, again, I have a stone of the same kind engraved with similar characters, the style and material of which carry it back to the same early period. The alphabetic forms of the Cretan symbols are found, moreover, on some triangular and quadrangular stones belonging to the same age as others with purely pictographic signs. This phenomenon makes it necessary to speak with caution as to the relation in which the linear forms stand to the more purely pictographic. It is evident that though typologically the pictorial characters are the earlier, and though in several cases the more alphabetic types obviously represent "hieroglyphs" reduced to linear outlines, there was a distinct overlapping of the two classes. In the case of many of the characters of the linear style the parallelism with Cypriote forms is most striking. That several of these Mycenaean characters are identical with those of the Cypriote syllabary is certain; on the Goulae cup, for example, the Cypriote pa and le occur in juxtaposition. On the other hand, as in the case of the third symbol on the same vase, there are several characters of the Cretan series which are not found in the Cypriote as at present known to us. It is unfortunate that our knowledge of the Cypriote syllabary begins so late.

But it is not in Cyprus only that the Mycenaean system of writing shows points of contact with the monuments of later Greek epigraphy. Prof. Halbherr, who is now in Candia, has made to me the valuable suggestion that some of the characters brought to light by the present investigation have influenced the forms of certain Greek letters found in the most archaic Cretan inscriptions, while in other cases they seem to have actually survived as marks of division. The o with the concentric circle and dot found on the early inscriptions of Lyttos, and a form of epsilon peculiar to Eleutherna, seem to be instances of the first phenomenon, while the operation of the second is attested by the appearance of the double-axe symbol as a mark of division both at Lyttos and in the great inscription of Gortyna.

To resume. The evidence supplied by these Cretan finds shows that long before the time when the Phoenician alphabet was first introduced into Greece the Aegean islanders, like their Asianic neighbours, had developed an independent system of writing. Of this writing there were two phases, one pictographic and much resembling the Hittite, the other linear and distinctly alphabetic in character. This latter system was certainly a syllabary, in part at least identical with that of Cyprus, perhaps, indeed, its direct progenitor. There are indications that both these systems extended to the Peloponnese, though Crete seems to have been its chief centre, and there can be little doubt that they were made use of by such members of the Hellenic stock as came within the range of "Mycenaean" culture. I do not think that it is too much to say that the crýpara Auyρά of Homer are here before us.

NOTES FROM ATHENS.

THE Archaeological Society of Athens—which since the transference of its collections to the Greek Government has been occupied in revising its statutes, with the idea of putting itself on a new basis, introducing public sittings, and founding a Greek school after the fashion of the foreign archaeological schools at Athens—has decided to undertake operations at Dipylon, near Hagia Triada. The new excavations will be a valuable continuation and completion of the previous ones, which led to the discovery of such beautiful sepulchral ornaments. In the new explorations the little church of the Hagia Triada will be demolished.

The Swedish Government has asked permission of the Greek Government to excavate the Temple of Poseidon, on the island of Kalauria (the present Poros). This is the temple in which, according to the ancient account, Demosthenes took poison in 322, when pursued by the player Archias, the emissary of Antipater. Dr. Wide will superintend the work. The ruins, which lie on a height about half an hour's walk from the convent of the Mother of God, hardly rise above the surface of the ground, but are of considerable extent; and since they lie apart from modern dwellings and out of the way of traffic, on a little visited island, it is hoped that the excavations may lead to good results.

As the neighbourhood of Olympia is one of the spots in Greece most visited by earthquakes, there has been some concern felt since the last upheaval regarding the safety of the Hermes of Praxiteles. The Athenian newspapers declared that the statue was to be transferred to the capital and be placed in the central hall of the Academy. The Inspector of Antiquities has felt himself called upon to stop these journalistic canards. No idea has been entertained, it seems, at the Ministry of Public Instruction of removing the statue. The work of Praxiteles is secured to the wall of the museum at Olympia, and the museum itself has nothing to fear. It is well known that this mode of exhibiting the statue has been often found fault with; but it was the only way to support firmly the footless statue and secure it against a possible fall. A transference of the statue to Athens would be a removal of it from the holy site, and would not only have deprived the museum there of its best ornament, but would also have involved the Greek Government in endless difficulties with the inhabitants of the whole province, in whose eyes the Hermes is at once a jewel of the district and a source of gain, owing to the number of natives and foreigners whom it attracts to the spot.

In a piece of ground (belonging to a Corinthian landowner named Rhendis) not far from the ancient Lecheum, excavations undertaken comparatively recently brought to light an old building with a floor of mosaic and eighteen marble columns, as well as a relief with the head of Medusa. The Commissioner of the Government who has been sent to the spot believes the structure to be a Roman bath. The proprietor of the land, on the other hand, holds himself to have discovered an ancient temple. It is to be remarked that behind the tablet bearing the relief stands a Christian cross.

The same auctioneers sold on the 20th inst. the following engravings, the property of the late Dr. A. G. Medwin: A. H. Haig, A Quiet Hour, 32l.; The Vesper Bell, 39l. Jules Jacquart, after E. Meissonier (remarque proofs), '1806', 25l.; '1807', 35l.; '1814', 68l.; Sergeant's Portrait, 25l.

Fine-Art Society.

THE important Adrian Hope Collection of seventy-five pictures is, as most readers know, to be sold by Messrs. Christie on Saturday next, the 30th inst., and will be on view in King Street three days preceding. There is a capital Albano, the 'Triumph of the Marine Venus,' painted, as many of Albano's works are, on copper, but quite above the average of his performances. Of two Borchers, 'The Interior of a Barn,' in grisaille, which Vischer engraved (Smith's No. 20), is the better, and noteworthy as an intentional imitation of A. Van Ostade. The fine and typical Both, 'A Hilly Landscape,' is Smith's 31. 'The Grand Canal, Venice,' by Canaletto, is a choice piece of its kind. G. Coques seldom painted anything better than the Saltmarshes 'Gentleman, Lady, and two Daughters,' with a marble group of the Graces in the background (Smith, 27). This master also excelled himself in 'A Gentleman, Lady, and Child,' with a little dog near the first (Brit. Inst. 1841, Smith, 12). The Saltmarshes Cuyt is of the highest merit and rare distinction; it is 'A Grand Landscape,' with a lady and gentleman riding towards us and close to the front (Smith, 177, and Supp. 48). 'The Flute Player,' by G. Dou, is Smith's Supp. 73, and a gem in every respect. Greuze's 'Young Girl,' listening at a window, is Smith's 69. The De Hooche every one admires in 'The Interior of a Chamber' (Smith, 29), from the Radstock and Scarsbrick galleries; it contains the figures of a woman, who is making a bed, and a little child. Lely's portrait of Mrs. Claypole when young is, of course, an early work in his purer manner. Mace's 'Woman Pumping,' from the Bernal Collection, is worthy of a royal gallery (Smith, 12). There are two other good instances of this first-rate master, one of which is Smith's No. 4. No one will overlook either of the Metsus, one of which is Smith's Supp. No. 28. W. Van Mieris's 'Judgment of Solomon,' in nineteen figures, from Fonthill, is Smith's No. 49. M. Van Musscher is almost at his best in 'A View in Amsterdam,' dated 1689, with two women and a dog. The remainder of the collection consists of a P. Noels; an Egton van der Neer; an A. Van Ostade; a capital A. Palamedes Stevarts; a renowned P. Potter; 'The Birth of Bacchus,' by N. Poussin; Rembrandt's 'J. Patronella Buys,' dated 1635 (Smith's 180), and his 'N. Ruta,' dated 1631; and works by Rubens, Ruysdael, J. Steen, D. Teniers, Terburg's whole-length 'Portrait of a Gentleman,' and pieces of corresponding value. The illustrated catalogue is a fine specimen of its class, the prints being of exceptional value.

MR. POYNTER'S purchases from the Eastlake Collection for the National Gallery, briefly alluded to in these columns last week, comprise, 1, 'The Virgin and Child,' by F. Lippi (the so-called Botticelli); 2, 'The Virgin and Child,' by Borgognone; 3, a diptych, representing 'The Adoration of the Shepherds' and 'The Dead Christ supported by Angels,' with SS. Jerome and Francis, by Ercole di Roberti; 4, 'The Virgin and Child,' with SS. John and Catherine, by Previtali; the picture is a well-known one and dated 1504. The Borgognone and the Ercole di Roberti will be placed in the Gallery immediately; the others wait attending to, and it may be some days before they can be hung. The Director has likewise bought a small portrait by G. Dou, and an interesting picture by P. Mazzuola, the father of Parmigiano, signed by the artist and in its original frame.

It is the intention of the authorities of the Nottingham Castle Museum and Art Gallery to hold during the coming autumn an exhibition of pictures by painters of Cornish subjects. Messrs. Stanhope Forbes, F. Bramley, A. Stokes, T. Goteh, and N. Hemy have undertaken to contribute their works; other examples will, of course, be welcome.

THE decease has to be chronicled of Mr. Calder Marshall at the age of eighty-one. Mr. Marshall was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1844, and a full Academician in 1852. He had much employment as sculptor between 1840 and 1860.

PROF. PERHAM, Mr. Mowat, and Mr. Haverfield have issued an appeal for subscriptions, to be applied, according to need, to the investigation of Hadrian's Wall. The Newcastle Society of Antiquaries, as our readers are aware, dug some sections in the Vallum last summer with very notable results, and the work is to be continued. The Cumberland Archaeological Society has voted 50l. and appointed a small committee to select suitable sites and promote excavations along the western part of the wall.

THE July number of the Antiquary will contain an article on the Huggate Dikes, the well-known entrenchments on the Yorkshire wolds, by the Rev. E. M. Cole; an account of the work begun this season at the Silchester excavations, by Mr. St. John Hope; and a description of the Heraldic Exhibition recently held at Burlington House.

THE Fine-Art Society have fixed the private view of a collection of two hundred water-colour drawings of Bible lands, by Mr. H. A. Harper, for to-day (Saturday).

MESSRS. LAWRIE & Co. exhibit a collection of pictures by deceased artists at No. 15, Old Bond Street, from and after to-day (Saturday).

PROF. MASPERO's work on the 'Dawn of Civilization' ('Les Origines'), treating of Egypt and Chaldean, will be published in the autumn simultaneously in Paris, London, and New York. The English translation will be edited by Prof. Sayce. The volume will consist of over 800 pages octavo, and will be copiously illustrated by drawings and maps made expressly for the work. The publishers in London will be the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

PROF. EMIL TESCHENDORF, of the Berlin Academy of Arts, who died on June 4th at the age of sixty, was a pupil of Piloty in Munich. He had been an active official of the Berlin Academy since 1877.

By an unfortunate mistake we gave the date last week of the opening of the joint congress of the Irish Society of Antiquaries and the Cambrian Archaeological Society as June 18th instead of July 16th.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

COVENT GARDEN OPERA.—'Lohengrin.' Production of 'La Navarraise,' a One-Act Opera, by M. Massenet. DRURY LANE OPERA.—'Die Walküre.' ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Witcher Concerts.

THE excellence of the chorus and the orchestra at Covent Garden this season cannot fail to be noticed, and the fact was, of course, specially conspicuous in the performance of 'Lohengrin' on Friday last week. But for the stupid cuts and the inartistic break between the two scenes of the third act the rendering would have commanded unqualified praise. M. Jean de Reszke in the titular part, Madame Melba as Elsa, Mlle. Giulio Ravogli as Ortrud, M. Edouard de Reszke as the King, and Signor Ancona as Telramund were unimpeachable; and Herr Waldmann, who had to sing in German, acquitted himself well as the Herald.

Signor Sonzogno probably did not imagine, when he first offered a prize for a one-act opera, that he would inaugurate a new fashion in lyric drama; but so it has come to pass. The wonderful success of 'Cavalleria Rusticana' naturally led to the production of other works of similar calibre, and certainly among the best of them must be numbered 'La Navarraise,' which was received with tumultuous applause at Covent Garden on Wednesday night. MM. J. Claretie and H. Cain have constructed a libretto, gruesome and morbid perhaps, but the dramatic force of which is undeniable; and M. Massenet has surpassed all his previous efforts in the score of this fifty-minute opera, showing a measure of virility and individuality for which one scarcely looked from a composer who has hitherto evinced his ability in sensuous, and what may be termed feminine, melodies and orchestration. The story, taking place near Bilbao during a Carlist insurrection, is certainly unpleasant—war, hopeless love, murder, and lunacy being the themes. No time is wasted in the development, the exquisite nocturne for orchestra alone, when the soldiers bivouac, being a welcome contrast to the storm and stress which otherwise prevail from the opening to the close. There are only two leading themes—the first, which is heard at once, and which also brings the work to a termination, being a sort of fate motive, and the other a passionate love strain. Among the more prominent portions of the score are the love duet between the valorous Sergeant Araquil and the hapless heroine Anita, who, in order to secure a dowry, commits a frightful crime, resembling that of Judith in the Apocrypha; and the soldiers' merry-making song and chorus, which is monotonous, but not in the least tedious. Recitative of the modern sort is freely employed, but it never becomes dull. 'La Navarraise' is certain to be a popular success, and a success that will not be disputed by musicians. The production at Covent Garden is worthy of much praise. The two leading characters have admirable representatives in Madame Calvé and M. Alvarez, both acting and singing in a manner that showed their hearts were in their work and that they were capable of rendering justice to it. General Garrido had a fine exponent in M. Plançon, and the smaller parts were efficiently sustained by M. Gillebert, M. Bonnard, and M. Dufliche.

That there is a large section of the public willing to support German opera, or, to speak more precisely, Wagnerian music drama, it is no longer possible to doubt. At the eleventh hour Sir Augustus Harris announced a series of performances at Drury Lane, and subscribers at once appeared in unexpected numbers. Let us hasten to add that if the promise indicated by the rendering of 'Die Walküre' on Tuesday evening is fulfilled, the gratitude of amateurs will be due to the enterprising manager. Seldom has this section of 'The Nibelung's Ring" been more worthily presented on a London stage. Herr Max Alvary is certainly not an ideal vocalist, still he is an artist of the first rank, and Frau Klafsky remains the most bewitching Brünnhilde it is possible to imagine. Her beautiful voice, the grace of her movements, always keeping in accord with the music, and her general earnestness and intelligence cannot fail to enthrall all admirers of the Bayreuth master. Rugged and vigorous as ever, Herr Wiegand is a suitable representative of Wotan; and Mr. David Bispham, who is rapidly advancing as a Wagnerian artist, was excellent as Hunding. The Sieglinde of Fräulein Gherlsen was charming as regards appearance, though weak in voice; and Fräulein Olitzka looked and sang well as Fricka. The difficult music for the Valkyries in the last act had been duly rehearsed, and the scene went well. In Herr Lohse Sir Augustus Harris has secured an excellent conductor, and if the tone of the violins is not all that could be desired, the large orchestra is, on the whole, a capable force.

There was no actual novelty in the Richter programme on Monday, but Dvorák's 'Carnaval,' Op. 92, the second section of his so-called Triple Overture, which was given at the Crystal Palace a few weeks ago, was performed for the first time at St. James's Hall, and Mr. Josef Hofmann made his first appearance at these entertainments. The youthful pianist was heard at his best in Rubinstein's picturesque Concerto in D minor, No. 4, of which he gave a remarkably brilliant and powerful interpretation. Schumann's Symphony in the same key was, of course, effectively rendered; but in spite of obvious efforts to do it justice, the Verwandlung's-Musik and the Graal-Feier from the first act of 'Parsifal' cannot make the necessary impression in the concert-room. An oft-repeated selection from 'Siegfried' and 'Götterdämmerung' completed the scheme.

Musical Society.

Of the innumerable performances of every sort that have taken place within the past few days only a small proportion can possibly receive notice. One that certainly should be mentioned was the first of three chamber performances, to be devoted respectively to Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, which was given by Miss Emily Shinner, Mr. Borwick, and Miss Fillinger at the Queen's Hall on Thursday last week. The principal instrumental items, which were all admirably interpreted, were the somewhat over-lengthy but beautiful posthumous Sonata in B flat, and the works for piano and violin, Rondo Brillant in B minor, Op. 70, and Fantasia in C, Op. 159. Miss Fillinger sang no fewer than eight of the Lieder in her most artistic fashion.

Those excellent vocalists Miss Esther Palliser (who has happily recovered from her illness caused by overwork) and Miss Agnes Janson gave an agreeable concert, chiefly of vocal music, also at the Queen's Hall, on the following evening, singing various high-class selections, in which they were assisted by Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Andrew Black, Mr. Norman Salmond, and Mr. Jack Robertson. The instrumental portion of the programme was safe in the hands of Mr. F. Dawson, M. Wolff, and M. Hollman.

The final concert this season of M. Tivadar Nacház took place at St. James's Hall on Saturday last week, when the somewhat ambitious Hungarian violinist played the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto, the same composer's two Romances in G, Op. 40, and F, Op. 50, a tuneful Romance in D by Mr. Arthur Hery, and various pieces by Prof. Stanford, Bazzini, and himself. M. Nacház was also represented as a composer by two agreeable though unpretentious songs, which were well interpreted by Mr. Ben Davies.

MR. TOBIAS MATTHAY, a clover, but as yet not very popular, pianist and composer, gave a pianoforte recital on Wednesday evening at the Queen's Hall, and displayed excellent technique, though a somewhat monotonous style, in various items by Schumann, Chopin, and later composers. Some vocal duets were contributed in pleasing fashion by Miss Dora Matthay and Mrs. Tobias Matthay.

A HIGH-CLASS if unpretentious concert was given by Mr. Arthur Somervell at the Princess' Hall, also on Wednesday evening. Mr. Somervell, who has recently gained prominence as a composer, was strongly represented in that capacity as a song-writer, no fewer than thirteen lyrics from his pen being included in the programme. These are musicianly effusions, appealing to amateurs who have no taste for ordinary shop ballads. Some of Brahms's 'Gipsy Songs' were sung by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. Hayden Bailey; and Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Leonard Borwick, Mr. Plunket Greene, and Mr. Theodore Byard took part in an entertainment much above the average of its kind.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

DAILY.—'Islyl,' Drama on Quatre Actes. Par Armand Shiveret et Eugène Morand.

COMEDY.—Revival of 'The Middleman.' By Henry Arthur Jones.

ADAPTED.—'Shall We Forgive Her?' a Play in Five Acts. By Frank Harvey.

NOTHING is sacred to the modern Frenchman. We need not be surprised accordingly at finding two dramatists taking as their hero Buddha and piecing out his mythical adventures from the Gospels. Upon the question of the expediency of these things there is no need to enter. The recorded history of Buddha forms a picturesque background to a play. The one thing to be urged against it is that any other would have served equally well. When the teacher of a third of the world is linked with a courtesan who practically dies for love of him the exigencies of the modern French stage are fulfilled. Apart from this background, which it is pardonable to consider whimsical, 'Izyl' is a melodrama of the type of 'La Tosca.' Of its four acts one is theatrically strong and, inasmuch as it furnishes Madame Bernhardt with opportunities, effective. The remainder is picturesque or fantastic. Izyl is one of the hetaïras whose influence over men is not to be resisted. Most ardent of her admirers is Prince Scydia, who, fascinated with her beauty, loads her with attentions and presents. It is, however, his brother Sakiamouni by whom she is attracted. She listens to him and looks at him as the Yoghi enlightens him as to his responsibilities and powers, and brings about his renegation of power and his retreat into what was practically an earlier Thebaid. With joyful anticipation she snatches her lips over the seduction of a virgin heart and the ruin of a noble mission. Fired with projects of conquest, she follows him and exhibits to him all her sorceries and wiles. The result is other than she expected, and she returns to her palace a convert, to sell all that she possesses and give to the poor. Not so easily as she anticipates does she lay down a life such as she has led. Scydia, now monarch, awaits her return, and will not be denied. He has already risked his life by robbing shrines to enrich her; he now seeks to win her by entreaties. It is too early for these to succeed. Full of her Buddha, Izyl is deaf to all other supplication. Scydia is not used to be denied. He resorts to violence. Finding her strength failing, Izyl snatches from his belt his dagger and drives it into his throat. The would-be ravisher falls at her feet, and the woman gazes in dismay on what she has done. Putting forth all her strength, she hides the body under the table laid for a banquet, and covers it with rose leaves. To the Princess Havastris she confides what she has done, meeting with sympathy and admiration, to be converted into deadly rage when the princess discovers that the victim is her own son. With her limbs broken and her eyes put out, Izyl is thrust into the desert, to be stoned by fanatics or eaten by vultures. Buddha then visits her, tells her how difficult he found the task of resisting her seductions, assures her of his love, and encourages her to hope for the approaching nirvana. Without the background, which has none of the poetry of 'The Light of Asia,' this is mere commonplace melodrama. There is nothing in it that appeals to the imagination or stirs the heart, and the strongest scenes leave us unmoved. Madame Bernhardt's marvellous art was shown in the scenes of seduction, which were exquisite, rather than in those of power. The well-known gifts were there, but scarcely exercised their full influence. M. Guity was effective as Buddha. The verse is nervous and effective, and the scenery is excellent.

After a tour in America extending over four years, Mr. Willard has reappeared as Cyrus Blenkarn in 'The Middleman,' a character in which his reputation was first established. His performance has gained rather than lost by repetition, and may rank as a thoughtful and finished piece of acting. So indifferent is, however, the support generally afforded him that one is glad that the experiment is for a few days only. Miss Agnes Verity assigned the heroine some tenderness and prettiness, and one or two subordinate characters were fairly presented. The whole, however, did not rise above the level of the country companies which make a single appearance in London, ordinarily in an afternoon, and then disappear to be no more seen. A different style of acting is necessary for characters so lifelike and unconventional as Mr. Jones supplies.

A simple, guileless, and sympathetic piece is that which Mr. Frank Harvey has contributed to the Adelphi. It deals with the sufferings of a wife whose uncomfortable and dishonouring past rises up unexpectedly to confront her. It is chiefly noteworthy as introducing an Adelphi heroine whose calamities are not wholly unmerited. Miss Julia Neilson gave a striking exhibition of intensity. Mr. F. Terry played with much earnestness in a difficult and somewhat repellent part. Mr. Macklin, Miss Ada Neilson, Mrs. Leigh, and other actors acquitted themselves well; and the piece, though weaker food than is ordinarily supplied to the Adelphi patrons, succeeded in winning a favourable verdict.

Dramatic Society.

BEFORE the close of the season Mr. Irving will give a few performances of 'Becket.'

'MONEY' has "caught on" at the Garrick, and no change will be necessary during the season. While Mr. Hare takes in the autumn a much-needed rest, Miss Kate Rorke and Mr. Forbes Robertson will begin, on August 27th at the Grand Theatre, Islington, a country tour with Mr. Pinero's comedy 'The Profligate.'

MR. E. H. VANDERVELT will replace Mr. Terriss in Mr. Irving's company in what is technically known as "juvenile lead."

THIS evening witnesses the first appearance at the Gaiety of Mlle. Réjane in 'Madame Sans-Gêne.'

BERLIN papers announce that Madame Sarah Bernhardt has asked Herr Sudermann's permission to perform, during the next theatrical season, his drama 'Heimat.' It is expected that the actress will play the part of Magda, the heroine of the play, which is to be called in French 'Le Foyer Paternel.'

A CURIOS feature in an illustrated supplement to the Echo de Paris which is wholly devoted to Madame Bernhardt is a portrait of the actress in 'Adrienne Lecouvreur,' which might almost pass for Mr. Henry Irving in feminine attire. The resemblance is striking.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN is going to publish 'Tiberius,' a posthumous drama of Mr. Francis Adams, with a preface by Mr. W. M. Rossetti.

NEW NOVELS AND STORIES.

SARAH: a Survival. By Sydney

CHRISTIAN, Author of 'Lydia.' 2 vols. crown 8vo.

cloth, 12s.

"A wholesome as well as a graceful book, full of charming and whimsical touches, and written with a decided distinction of style."—Advertiser.

"It is a surprise and a refreshment in these days of morbid and melancholy heroines to meet with one so well content with life, of so cheerful a countenance, as the young lady who gives her name to Sydney Christian's novel, 'Sarah.' The author has the gift of presentation; his characters stand out clearly, his descriptive passages have brilliant rapidity of effect, the talk throughout is spontaneous. The charm of freshness is on the book."—Daily News.

"At last we have a story of a woman and of womanhood which may be read with satisfaction and pleasure. 'Sarah: a Survival,' by Sydney Christian, is a remarkable work in every way. It is rarely original and not eccentric, it is thoughtful and not pretentious. It is interesting as a narrative and extremely clever as a study of character. It is written in admirable English, and abounds in humor of a quiet, detectable kind. 'Sarah' is a gem, so in her old uncle Dan, who rebukes his prime and proper sister Rachel by observing that he is 'thankful to say he never enters Sarah's head to be grateful.'—World.

TIMES.—"The subject of Uganda has for the first time been made attractive to the general reader. The book has the quality of actuality which is so often developed by the training of the man of the world. It tells precisely what everybody wants to know, and notwithstanding the modest disclaimer of any original scientific information with which the author accompanies his narrative, few people will lay down the volume without feeling that the vexed question of our communications with the interior has acquired a reality which it did not possess before."

SIR GERALD PORTAL'S
MISSION TO UGANDA.

STANDARD.—"Sir Gerald Portal and his editor, Mr. Rodd, have together given us a volume that is deeply interesting, not only for the light that it throws upon life in Central Africa, but for the close personal view that it presents of a man who was certain to have risen to the highest distinction in the service of his country."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"So bright and fresh and manly is his record that we hardly know any book of travel on the Dark Continent that surpasses those first eight chapters for clear description and vivid picture."

SIR GERALD PORTAL'S
MISSION TO UGANDA.

DAILY NEWS.—"In a word, his description of the expedition is one of the most deeply interesting records of East Africa ever written. The numerous illustrations in it are very well executed, and there is an excellent map of the route to and the country surrounding Uganda. No one who wants to understand the East African problem can afford to neglect this book."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"The value of the publication at this moment is great, throwing as it does a strong light on all the questions which are to-day before the country respecting Uganda and the regions through which it is approached from the east.....We cannot speak too highly of the way in which the editing has been done by Mr. Rennell Rodd."

SIR GERALD PORTAL'S
MISSION TO UGANDA.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Even more, perhaps, than the dead diplomatist's official report, this book is at present our most valuable document for the decision of the problems of British East Africa. For Mr. Rodd's memoir and editing there can wait nothing but the faintest gratitude. It is a valuable monograph of an expert on countries and questions vital to British interests."

EPPS'S COCOAINE,

COCOAINE EXTRACT. (TRADE-MARK)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up bones) of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"COCAINE," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the conditions of tea, of which it is now beneficially taking the place with many. Its active principle, being a gentle nerve-stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in packets and tins, labelled "JAMES EPPS & CO. (Ld.), Homeopathic Chemists, London."

Chatto & Windus's New Novels.

The WHITE VIRGIN. By Geo. MANVILLE PENN. 3 vols.

"It is all very exciting, and not in the least probable; but Mr. Penn is an experienced writer of novels, and knows very well the style of fiction which fulfils a well-developed public demand. At all events, a critic will cheerfully own that his women are women, and not female psychological wonders, who bore the lowly creature man with conundrums as to the relations of the sexes."—Glasgow Herald.

A DAUGHTER of TO-DAY. By SARA JEANETTE DUNCAN, Author of 'A Social Departure.' 2 vols.

"This is quite one of the cleverest novels we have read this season. Elfrida is a splendidly executed portrait. We have nothing but praise for the novel."—Daily Chronicle.

A SOLDIER of FORTUNE. By L. T. MEADE, Author of 'The Medicine Lady.' 3 vols.
 "Phyllis is a really fascinating character."—Daily Chronicle.

IN the FACE of the WORLD. By ALAN ST. AUBYN, Author of 'A Fellow of Trinity.' 2 vols.

"A wholesome and sweet novel, which should have a wide welcome."—Glasgow Herald.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

A WASTED CRIME. By D. Christie MURRAY, Author of 'Joseph's Coat.'

"A narrative tragedy which, in virtue of the strength and finish of its portraiture, the delicate precision of its literary workmanship, and the inevitableness of its dramatic movement, takes a high place, not only among the novels of the year, but among the achievements of the admirable writer from whom it comes. The concluding chapters of 'A Wasted Crime' represent a good novelist at his strongest and best."—Daily Chronicle.

RED and WHITE HEATHER. North Country Tales and Ballads. By ROBERT BUCHANAN, Author of 'God and the Man.'

TO HIS OWN MASTER. By Alan ST. AUBYN, Author of 'The Old Maid's Sweetheart.'

"A readable and interesting novel."—Athenæum.

OUTLAW and LAWMAKER. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PHAED.

"A novel of high literary quality, remarkable power, and great interest. Should be one of the most widely read novels of its year."—Daily Telegraph.

MR. SADLER'S DAUGHTERS. By HUGH COLEMAN DAVIDSON.

"Mr. Sadler's Daughters,' according to the frontispiece, are exceedingly pretty and desirable young ladies, in baggy blouses and beaded-trimmed sailor hats, and it is the usual thing with them—a little glow, a little shiver—and they are in love, and young men with them, and Mr. Coleman Davidson's story ends happily, as it should."—Black and White.

The RED SHIRTS: a Tale of the Terror. By PAUL GAULOT. Translated by J. A. J. DE VILLIERS.

"Should any one desire to assuage his brain with the blood of the French Revolution let him read 'The Red Shirts.' The book will convey better than any history—except Carlyle's—a picture of the miserable Inferno."—Morning Leader.

MEMOIRS of a LANDLADY. By GEORGE R. SIMS, Author of 'My Two Wives,' &c. Post 8vo. Illustrated boards, 2s.; cloth, 2s. 6d.

The SAVOY OPERA and the SAVOYARDS. By PERCY FITZGERALD. With 60 Illustrations and Portraits. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

"The Savoy Opera' promises a present interest and a permanent value.....In no sense does the work disappoint anticipation. Mr. Fitzgerald brings to his task not only a keen appreciation of the humour and conceits of words and music which have distinguished this special class of entertainment, but also exhibits in no mean degree the cultured taste and confident judgement of a critic of ripe experience.....I would gladly linger over this timely volume, which contains a vast amount of information. It has special claims to attention, inasmuch as it is the first serious attempt to give a consecutive review of an operatic era of great importance."—Nen.

FIFTY YEARS of MY LIFE
In the WORLD of SPORT at HOME and ABROAD. By Sir JOHN DUGDALE ASTLEY, Bart.

"It is not too much to say that in writing these two volumes, which he has, by permission, dedicated to the Prince of Wales, Sir John Astley has not only produced a book which will amuse and in some measure instruct the thousands who will be anxious to read it, but has also taken his place amongst the best chroniclers of his time."—Times, May 18.

"In conclusion, we never read a book into the trammels and attractions of which it is more impossible to give us insight by a few quotations. It is the work of a thoroughly great and good fellow, who has seen nearly every vicissitude of life that the open air can afford, and has touched nothing without adorning it."—Daily Telegraph.

THIRD EDITION of MARY FENWICK'S DAUGHTER. By HEATHER WHITEY, Author of 'The Awakening of Mary Fenwick,' 'One Woman's Story,' &c. 3 vols.

"Miss Whitey may be said to have justified her courage in reviving the Fenwick family. Mary's daughter has it once more a strong and striking character study. She exists by thousands, but has seldom been so skilfully manipulated as by Miss Whitey."—Athenæum.

The FOOL of DESTINY. By Colin MIDDLETON, Author of 'Innocent of Blarney.' 3 vols.

The HUSBAND of ONE WIFE. By Mrs. YERN, Author of 'Some Married Fellows,' &c. 3 vols.

"The theme is a good one, but one requiring delicate handling. Mrs. Yern has treated it excellently, so much so that the interest increases instead of diminishing as she proceeds, and the third volume, in our opinion, is much the best of the set. The Husband of One Wife is good work, and its persons may safely be recommended."—Glasgow Herald.

"The Husband of One Wife is an excellent book, in which all healthy-minded novel-readers will find something to interest them."—Dundee Advertiser.

LITERATURE

Memoirs to serve for the History of Napoleon I.
By Baron Claude-François de Méneval.
Arranged and edited by his Grandson,
Baron Napoleon Joseph de Méneval.
Translated and annotated by Robert H.
Sherard. Vols. I. and II. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THIS latest addition to Napoleonic literature can hardly venture to challenge comparison with the memoirs of Madame de Rémusat. In them we had an incomparable portrait of the Emperor as he appeared to a penetrating and yet not uncharitable observer: the supreme military genius, the incomparable administrator, the confirmed conspirator, and the innate vulgarian. The accuracy of Madame de Rémusat's recollections has been impeached in detail, but her pages must always remain the chief source whence to derive a knowledge of the real Napoleon. Baron de Méneval, on the contrary, approaches his subject with uncritical idolatry. We read of a man "free from all baseness, straightforward, magnanimous, exempt from low passions, endowed with every kind of courage," and much besides. These sentiments do credit to the worthy secretary's heart, but they do not impress one with the strength of his understanding. Altogether this instalment disappoints somewhat as recollections of Napoleon, but the unconscious revelations of its author are uncommonly interesting.

With innocent copiousness the Baron begins by setting forth how he thought of adopting literature as a profession, how the veteran Palissot introduced him to Louis Bonaparte, and Louis to Joseph. He gives an animated account of Joseph's household at Mortfontaine, and confirms the impression that he was the most praiseworthy, as he was certainly one of the ablest of the Bonapartes. There Méneval met Count Cobenzl, the representative of Austria at the Congress of Lunéville, and his peculiarities are set forth with some acuteness:

"Count Cobenzl spoke French without any accent and had nothing German about him but his name. Although clumsy, big, fat, and short, his manners were easy and graceful. His conversation, as a general rule, was superficial, and abounded in witticisms; his wit was ingenious rather than profound. He affected a vivacity and an evenness of temper which was sometimes modified by a sudden preoccupation. Sometimes in the midst of some gay anecdote, such as he delighted in telling, his features would become set, a grave expression would take the place of a smile, and his wandering eyes become fixed like a machine of which the movements cease suddenly without apparent cause. His affectation of appearing delighted with everything, and of finding that everything that was proposed to him was just what he had been wishing for, was vexation of soul to excellent Madame Bonaparte, who was never able to detect in him a preference for anything whatever."

A good deal of random dissertation on the probable fate of the manuscript of Napoleon's academical speech and other matters interrupts the progress of the Baron's narrative. He has much to say on the Concordat, and makes the curious remark that many of the influential persons in public affairs seemed disposed to embrace the Protestant religion. Most people will agree with him that the arrangement was one of the most important acts of Napoleon's government, and the best that circumstances permitted. But when he asks us to believe that its originator was sincerely religious and a true Catholic, he really makes too large a demand on our credulity. Méneval attended Joseph Bonaparte at Amiens, where the latter negotiated the treaty with Lord Cornwallis. He was favourably impressed by the British Plenipotentiary, "a fine old man of about sixty-eight, tall, with a noble face, and with open and kindly manners." The value of his historical criticism may be appreciated by the fact that, though he admits that the Maltese question was evaded rather than resolved, our refusal to surrender the island becomes later on a typical instance of British perfidy.

Méneval's summons to the Tuileries, on his appointment as private secretary to Napoleon in succession to Bourrienne, evidently left a very vivid impression on his memory, and he records every incident alike trivial and important. His regret for his loss of liberty was evidently sincere, and he gives a humorous description of his first attempt to take down the First Consul's dictation:—

"I sat down at a table which stood in the embrasure of a window, and waited for nearly two hours for the return of the First Consul. He arrived at last, holding a paper in his hand. Without appearing to pay any attention to my presence in his study, just as if I had always been there, and had always occupied the same place, he dictated a note for the Minister of Finance, with such volubility that I could hardly understand or take down half of what he was dictating. Without asking me whether I had heard him or whether I had finished writing, he took the paper away from me, and would not let me read it over, and, on my remarking it was an unintelligible scribble, he said it was on a matter well known to the Minister, who would easily be able to make it out, and, so saying, he went back to the drawing-room."

The causes of Bourrienne's dismissal are recounted with minuteness, and they certainly tend to show that Napoleon was, in many instances, a long-suffering master. Indeed, his kindness to his old friends and schoolfellows formed a most creditable feature in his character.

"Napoleon was surrounded by living reminders of his youth. He had with him, besides Bourrienne, Col. Lauriston, who had also been at school with him at Brienne. Father Dupuis, formerly schoolmaster in his town, was living in peaceful and honourable retirement at La Malmaison. Although there were very few books there, and these were in Napoleon's study, which M. Dupuis never entered, he enjoyed the title of librarian. He was an excellent man, and literally worshipped his former pupil. He had retained from his management of the Brienne school the practice of domestic economy rather than a taste for books and study. He had principally occupied himself there with the cultivation of vineyards. At Malmaison there were no longer the precious vines of Champagne to be inspected, but M. Dupuis bought plots of standing vines at Garches, and at Suresnes, and by means of a certain process removed the greenness and acidity of the grapes for which Suresnes wine has been proverbially notorious, and was able to produce sweet and sparkling Champagne wine. The house-porter at La Malmaison was a man called Hauté, who had formerly been porter at the Brienne school. This excellent man and his wife had found pleasant quarters here also. The two brothers Desmazis, who had been with Napoleon at the Military School, were not forgotten. The elder was appointed director of the State Lottery in 1806, and the younger, who had been Napoleon's particular friend, was provided with the place of Director of the Crown Furniture. During the Hundred Days he filled the office of chamberlain."

Though blind as to the defects of his divinity, Méneval sums up Cambacérés, Lebrun, and the ministry shrewdly enough. He holds Gaudin's financial skill in just esteem, and he entertains a holy hatred of Fouché:—

"In appearance he reminded me of Marat, whom I had frequently seen in my early youth. Fouché was taller, very thin; his hair and eyebrows were pale, his eyes were bloodshot, and his complexion was livid. He spoke with a volubility which made one think that he was unburdening the whole of his thoughts. He affected a limitless devotion to the First Consul. It would sometimes happen that he would come to La Malmaison when Napoleon was away. He would then come to me, and take me out with him into the park, and speak to me at length on the vigilance with which he performed his duties, of the intimidation which he practised on the malcontents of every class, of the zeal which devoured him, and the help which he would always be ready to give the First Consul in whatever he might wish to undertake, invariably finishing with the words: 'Be sure to tell the First Consul all I have said.'"

The good man preserves a most judicious silence on the domestic scandals of the Bonapartes, and even that scabrous event, the marriage of Louis to Hortense de Beauharnais, passes with the bare comment that they were not the most devoted of couples. However, Madame de Rémusat has amply supplied his deficiencies in that respect. But the following episode is now and curious in its way:—

"Some days later, Madame Bonaparte came and knocked at the door of the cabinet. She immediately entered, followed by the usher, who without a word placed a basket covered over with a cloth in the centre of the room and withdrew. Whilst Napoleon was waiting for the explanation of this enigma Madame Bonaparte drew away the cloth which covered the basket. A little man, not more than eighteen inches high, who was lying down in the basket, raised himself with difficulty and, leaning with his two hands on the handle of the basket, turned a pair of dark and shining, but lustreless, eyes upon us. This dwarf was dressed in complete hussar uniform, with the red shako, vest, and dolman, regulation boots, and was girt with a sabre which kept entangling itself in his little legs. There was nothing monstrous about him except his extreme smallness. His limbs were well-made, his features, if inert, were regular. Nevertheless the evident insensibility of this misconception, whose life seemed merely mechanical, and whose intelligence seemed destined never to develop—for he was said to be then seventeen years old—his debility, the pale and bilious colour of his skin, and his weakened and sickly ensemble, excited disgust. The sight of this poor disinherited creature, nature's cruel sport, placed face to face with a full-grown being, in whom the same nature had been pleased to unite a majesty of features to a superiority of genius, would have offered a singular contrast to the eyes of an observer. The fine and impressionable organism of Napoleon evidently suffered from so painful a sight, and without one word of comment, he prayed his wife to remove the dwarf from his eyes."

Méneval's account of the various complications which led to the renewal of the war is evidently sincere, but it will hardly supplant the generally accepted view. The underlying theory that Napoleon was passionately attached to peace, and that he was driven into hostilities by the machinations of the British Government, is hard to believe. However, according to Méneval, the annexations of Napoleon were the most natural thing in the world; but for an accident, Sebastiani's report on Egypt would have assumed the most innocuous form imaginable; the lecture to Lord Whitworth was not, as the profane have it, a consummate piece of acting, but the effect of overwrought nerves. He surpasses himself in dealing with the judicial murder of the Duc d'Enghien. The business, it would appear, was a series of unfortunate blunders. Some stupid person reported that Dumouriez was at Ettenheim, whereas the real visitor was General Thumery, and an English Col. Smith resolved himself into a German Capt. Schmidt. Then, again, Napoleon fully intended to pardon the victim, only Dautancourt, the captain reporter, suppressed the Duke's request for a private interview, and Réal, who should have transmitted the news of the sentence, went to bed instead. When all was over, Napoleon magnanimously assumed the blame, and shielded his agents. Mr. Sheridan points out that, a page or two later, Méneval becomes involved in the most hopeless contradictions; and altogether we have seldom come across a more astounding instance of self-deception. On the other hand, he very sensibly declines to accept the subsequent protestations of innocence put forward by Talleyrand and Caulaincourt.

It is needless to state that Méneval altogether misses the irony of the situation when the Pope was led captive to Paris to crown the Emperor. Also he indignantly repudiates the idea that Napoleon had recourse to underhand manoeuvres to secure the dignity. As for the brand-new ceremonies and functionaries, they were reproductions of those of the ancient French monarchy and the imperial monarchy of Germany "purged of what was servile and Gothic." Again, Méneval piously rejects the story that Napoleon, when clothed in his coronation robes, rallied the ex-advocate who had tried to prevent his marriage with Josephine, on the ground that he was a penniless soldier. He did not say, "Raguideau, here is the cape and here is the sword," for his mind was occupied with loftier thoughts. But "Joseph," he cried to the dearest and most familiar of his brothers, "if father could see us!" On the other hand, Méneval brings considerable insight to bear upon the Austerlitz campaign, and he disposes conclusively of the notion that the invasion of England was never intended seriously. But the most valuable portion of the first volume consists in the passages describing his master's personal habits and peculiarities. The Emperor spied upon his secretary, as he spied on every one; but his explosion of wrath on account of sundry evenings spent at the Restaurant Robert with "amiable ladies" and opponents of the Government was evidently feigned, and otherwise he never ceased to be "good, patient, and indulgent." Méneval testifies to Napoleon's extraordinary power of doing without sleep:—

"The Emperor used to have me waked in the night, when—owing either to some plan which he considered ripe for execution, and which had to be carried out, or to the necessity of maturing the preliminaries of some new project, or to having to send off some courier without loss of time—he was obliged to rise himself. It sometimes happened that I would hand him some document to sign in the evening. 'I will not sign it now,' he would say. 'Be here to-night, at one o'clock, or at four in the morning; we will work together.' On these occasions I used to have myself waked some minutes before the appointed hour. As, in coming downstairs, I used to pass in front of the door of his small apartment, I used to enter to ask if he had been waked. The invariable answer was: 'He has just rung for Constant,' and at the same moment, he used to make his appearance, dressed in his white dressing-gown, with a Madras handkerchief round his head. When, by chance, he had got to the study before me, I used to find him walking up and down with his hands behind his back, or helping himself from his snuff-box, less from taste than from pre-occupation, for he only used to smell at his pinches, and his handkerchiefs were never soiled with the snuff. His ideas developed as he dictated, with an abundance and a clearness which showed that his attention was firmly riveted to the subject with which he was dealing; they sprang from his head even as Minerva sprang, fully armed, from the head of Jupiter."

Again:—

"Napoleon rarely wrote himself. Writing tired him; his hand could not follow the rapidity of his conceptions, he only took up the pen when by chance he happened to be alone and had to put the first rush of an idea on to paper; but after writing some lines he used to stop and throw away his pen. He would then go out to call his secretary, or, in his absence, either the second secretary or the Secretary of State or General Duroc, or sometimes the aide-de-camp on duty, according to the kind of work in which he was engaged. He made use of the first who answered his call, without irritation, but rather with a visible satisfaction at being relieved from his trouble. His writing was a collection of letters unconnected with each other, and unreadable. Half the letters to each word were wanting, he could not read his own writing again, or would not take the trouble to do so. If he was asked for some explanation he would take his draft and tear it up, or throw it into the fire, and dictate it over again—the same idea, it is true, but couched in different language and a different style. Although he could detect faults in the spelling of others his own orthography left much to be desired. It was negligence which had become a habit, he did not want to break or tangle the thread of his thoughts by paying attention to the details of spelling. Napoleon also used to make mistakes in figures, absolute and positive as arithmetic has to be. He could have worked out the most complicated mathematical problems, and yet he could rarely total up a sum correctly. It is fair to add that these errors were not always made without intention. For example, in calculating the number of men who were to make up his battalions, regiments, or divisions, he always used to increase the sum total. One can hardly believe that in doing so he wanted to deceive himself, but he often thought it useful to exaggerate the strength of his armies. It was no use pointing out any mistake of this kind; he refused to admit it, and obstinately maintained his voluntary arithmetical error."

We might also quote Méneval's evidence of the Emperor's capacity for grasping the minutiae of military reports and for transacting widely different matters without confusion or fatigue of mind. In the second volume he returns to the topic, and gives some most curious details of Napoleon's extraordinary sense of smell, his meals, and his private economies. "You are rich, Talleyrand," he once said, "and, when I am in want of money, it is to you that I shall apply. Frankly, now, how much have you made out of me?" Talleyrand, not in the least disconcerted, replied that he was a poor man, and what he had lay at the Emperor's service.

Méneval's turn for special pleading by no means deserts him when dealing with the Jena campaign. Prussia, we read, was led astray "by lying reports and perfidious manoeuvres such as are lavished by the English Government," and he regards the execution of the bookseller Palm as perfectly justifiable. He further declares that the Emperor was not blind to the rigour of the Berlin decree, and he apparently attributes its failure to the insatiable greed of Russia. Méneval has little new to say about the Treaty of Tilsitt, but he is certainly correct in regarding the creation of the Duchy of Warsaw as the main cause of the subsequent rupture with the Czar. He adds, judiciously enough, that Prussia was left "either too strong or too weak." Yet he is firmly convinced that the forcible change of dynasty in Spain demanded no apology, since "the country, which was the continuation of our soil, was in a state of decay which would inevitably have led to her falling an easy prey to England." This is a large assumption indeed, and confusion of cause and effect underlies his theory that the enterprise would have succeeded but for the new struggles into which Napoleon was dragged by the Coalition.

The writer was present during the campaign which ended with the Peace of Vienna, and he duly comments on the great loss which the army sustained in the death of Lannes. We are also told that "even on the field of battle the Emperor would pull up in front of a regiment, and calling the officers around him would address each by his name. He would ask them to mention whom amongst them they considered most worthy of promotion or of a decoration, and then passed on to the soldiers. Such testimony delivered by the poets [by those of the same rank] bound the various regiments together with the bands of confidence and esteem, and those promotions, granted by the soldiers themselves, had all the more value in their eyes. In the course of one of these distributions of military rewards, which were like family scenes, an under-officer was designated to the Emperor as the bravest and the best. The colonel, whilst agreeing that he possessed all the qualities necessary to make a good officer, added that, in rendering him this justice, he regretted that, on account of a serious drawback, he was unable to recommend him for promotion. 'What is it?' asked Napoleon quickly. 'Sire, he can neither read nor write.' 'I appoint him officer, colonel; you will have him admitted as such.'

Méneval's analysis of the growing estrangement between Napoleon and Talleyrand is most acute, though he flatly contradicts himself with regard to one of its chief causes. Thus in vol. i. we are told that the Emperor never reproached the minister for his connexion with the death of the Duc d'Enghien; in vol. ii. Napoleon is represented as actually threatening Talleyrand with his fist and crying, "You dare, you dare to deny the part you took in the condemnation." Méneval also commits a palpable blunder when he asserts that Fouché broached the divorce to Josephine without Napoleon's authority. However, it is easy to believe that the Emperor parted from her with deep regret, though the "nobility of sentiment" displayed by Eugène de Beauharnais and Queen Hortense may not be so easily perceptible. The description of the Empress Marie Louise is distinctly pleasing, and in her limp way she was evidently attached to her husband, who, in turn, regarded her with a somewhat jealous affection, while he doted on the little King of Rome. Méneval gives a curious instance of the manner in which the Berlin decree affected even the Court. In order to stimulate French industries,

"Napoleon forbade the use of cotton or of foreign wood for the furniture of the Imperial Palaces; he desired that the people who were invited to the drawing-rooms at Court should dress only in silk, so as to encourage the Lyons manufactures. He declared war on Indian cashmere, but his power was impotent against the tyranny of fashion, and against routine. The Emperor threatened the Empress in vain that he would throw her cashmere shawls into the fire. The Empress used to answer him that as soon as they could give her stuffs as light and warm as the cashmere woollens she would be very glad to wear them. The Emperor encouraged the manufacturers of French shawls, and commissioned Isabey to make the designs of a magnificent woollen stuff like cashmere, on a white ground, with which a shawl and a dress were made. Marie Louise wore them with some reluctance; these stuffs had not the softness which they have since acquired. The Empress used to complain with reason that her dress 'griped' whenever she went near the fire."

The second volume ends with a very one-sided investigation of the causes of the war with Russia.

A Life of Archbishop Laud. By "A Romish Recusant." (Kegan Paul & Co.)

It was quite recently that we congratulated the Roman Church on producing an historian like Father Gasquet at a time when erudition appears to be dying out among the parochial clergy of the Anglican Church. But such a conspicuous instance as "A Recusant" affords is well calculated to make a critic pause before concluding that learning has been taken captive by the nets of St. Peter. In intention he has given us, so says "A Recusant," not so much a life as materials for a life of Laud. The claim would be preposterous in the mouth of any man, for the materials for a life of Laud are scattered over Europe. They comprise a large portion of the most voluminous and rich historical literature in the world—hundreds of volumes at the Record Office, Lambeth, and Oxford; thousands of those "shot rubbish" tracts at the Museum over which Carlyle made such inarticulate moan; historical collections, diaries, lives, letters, dull reprints by society after society, and a controversial library as extensive and important as that which has emanated from the Anglo-Catholic movement of our own century—if not more so.

"A Recusant" really seems to be unaware—but it is surely impossible—that the printed Calendars of State Papers out of which, and a life of Laud by Mr. Benson often and unctuously quoted, the book before us is manufactured—that these calendars are indexes to manuscript papers preserved at the Record Office, freely accessible to the public six days a week, and that Lambeth, too, is accessible on similar terms to any student. But the book before us sins not merely by ignorance; it doubly sins by its lack of frankness and taste. It consists of a series of extracts from Laud's diaries and the printed Calendars of State Papers pieced together in something like chronological order by a connecting thread of flippant and inaccurate innuendo. Laud's views on the Real Presence, for instance, are thus estimated:—

"He keeps harping on the point that Lutherans and Calvinists and Anglicans all hold variations of the same doctrine on the Real Presence, all of them being diametrically opposed to that of the Catholics. As for the Lutherans, they neither deny nor doubt of his true and Real Presence there, and they are Protestants; and as for the Calvinists, if they might be rightly understood, they also maintain a most true and real Presence though they cannot permit their judgment to be transubstantiated, and they are Protestants too.' We are all Protestants, and our differences of opinion as to the Real Presence are much the same as those twixt tweedledum and tweedledee, he seems to say."

Or take the following from p. 172, where "A Recusant" is speaking of Laud's attempts to impose fines in order to raise funds for the rebuilding of St. Paul's, and of the recalcitrance of certain people of quality:—

"Some of my readers, whose clergymen are engaged in restoring their churches, may be able to sympathize with these people of quality if they will try to imagine their parsons empowered to fine them and devoting the fines so obtained to their building funds. Could anything be more galling? The contrast between these fines wrung from angry offenders and the methods by which funds were raised for the erection of many Catholic cathedrals is very great. I am referring to the so-called sale of Indulgences. The Church has at times published to her children, in her exercise of that power of the Keys given to Peter, &c. &c., that the temporal penalties or canonical penances due for their sins, these being first duly repented of and forgiven, were by her commuted for other works of piety, among the rest for alms given towards the building of a church or hospital. Surely voluntary penitential offerings of this kind were more likely to lead to the benefit of the souls of the sinners than Laud's fines."

But far more than the want of taste and logic, there is attributable to "A Recusant" a controversial intent that is but thinly veiled under the guise of historic treatment, and quite inexcusable in our days. Speaking of Laud's much disputed consecration service and its elaborateness, "A Recusant" finds his usual parallel in later times:—

"I have no doubt that it was on the same principle that I once saw a High Church Anglican clergyman celebrating the Communion Service with a large copy of the Book of Common Prayer on the desk on the Communion table and a very small copy of the 'Garden of the Soul,' opened at the 'Ordinary of the Mass,' lying beside it. I asked him afterwards his reason for this, and he said that he read aloud the prescribed order for Holy Communion out of the Anglican Prayer Book, and interposed in a whisper such prayers out of the Roman Missal as he thought good, adding that this was a common practice among clergymen of his school. Like Laud he probably thought that he was separating the chaff without casting away the corn," &c.

To quote further extracts would be to waste space. A serious and honest life of Laud written from the Roman Catholic side would be a boon to the historical student. On questions of fact, of doctrine, of ceremonies, we could learn much by such a side-light. Take for a moment the last point—that of Laud's consecration service used at the dedication of St. Catherine's Cree and St. Giles-in-the-Fields. "Whether Andrews [sic] or Laud drew up this form of consecration," says "A Recusant," "is not of much consequence; what is certain is that it was something of an adaptation of the Roman Ritual." This is simply untrue. The office "De ecclesie dedicatione seu consecratione," detailed in the Pontifical, prescribes fasts and vigils on the evening preceding the consecration. This is absent from the only account of Laud's service which we can accept as authentic. The enumeration of the mere apparatus of the action in the Catholic service—"vas cum cineribus, vas cum sale, vas vini," &c.—fills almost a page of the rubric of the one, and is totally absent from the other form. In the Roman service the action itself appertains rather to the consecration of the relics of the saint to whom the church was dedicated than to the separation of the fabric of the church to God and a holy use, which is the only purpose in the English; and in the mere ceremonies of the day there is not one single point of salient resemblance. "A Recusant" is aware that what on the particular occasion of the consecration of St. Catherine's Cree would have been offensive to Anglican feeling, if perpetrated, was distinctly denied by Laud to have been so perpetrated. "There was no throwing up of dust nor curses used throughout the whole action," he said in his 'Defence.' The only account which we have of the consecration of St. Catherine's Cree is that of a hostile witness. But "A Recusant" is probably not aware that there exists both in print and in the episcopal registry of London an authentic form of this service as used by Laud in the consecration of the parish church of St. John in Stanmore Magna (Middlesex). This form is derived, without the least possibility of gainsaying, from Andrewes's form, which is accessible to "A Recusant" in Sparrow's 'Articles' and elsewhere if he care to search—and derived, too, with such literal exactness as not in a single material point to pass beyond or exceed that drawn up by Andrewes. There is also in existence and belonging to the same age a third form of the ceremony—that employed in the consecration of the parish church of Fulmer in Buckingham in 1610 by Dr. Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln. At second hand, but in full and evidently faithful outline, it is preserved for us in Stow's 'Annals,' fol. 908. In detail it differs from Andrewes's, but not essentially. But the occurrence of it alongside of the latter's makes us curious as to the origin of both these—at law unauthorized and unrecognized—forms of consecration. There is no Roman Pontifical of the time that can be pointed to as the fountain or source of either. Barlow's form is apparently ten years earlier than Andrewes's, and does not contain the reference to the chanting of the twenty-fourth Psalm as the officiating priest approached the doors of the church which occurs in Andrewes's form, and is likewise a feature in the Roman service. If "A Recusant" had shown us the real origin of either form, but of Andrewes's especially, instead of gratuitously assuming its derivation from the Roman Pontifical, he would have rendered a real service.

Similarly—to take another point—most Anglicans have a certain curiosity to see a statement from the Romanist side of Laud's general position with regard to the Papacy. If there be one controversy of importance in English history, it is that between Anglicanism and Romanism in the days of James I.; and of the many moot points on which fuller and documentary evidence would be peculiarly acceptable, the negotiations, so called, for Laud's elevation to a cardinalship, and the whole matter of his attitude towards Durie's scheme for the uniting of the Protestant churches, are not the least. In all these matters "A Recusant" leaves his readers exactly where they were. He attributes James's conversion from "High Churchism with Calvinism to a sort of quasi-Arminianism" (sic) to his acquaintance with Laud. It is quite impossible. As far as questions of mere ecclesiastical polity are concerned, James's conversion was accomplished in the hour of his accession to the English throne; the change in his doctrinal position, however, is by no means so easy of statement. But certainly it was not due to Laud. Anglicanism in the modern sense begins with Whitgift, and after him Bancroft was as strong and self-conscious an assertor of it as ever was Laud; and in the mere domain of thought and dogma there were men who preceded Laud—Davenant of Salisbury, Hall of Norwich, Carleton of Llandaff, Goad, Laud's own tutor Buckridge, and a whole school more—of still greater doctrinal note than he in the history of English "Arminianism," to use a negative term of as equivocal import as was that other term of "Puritanism" in Laud's own mouth.

In the doctrinal war which waged round the king's chair at Hampton Court, Laud's figure is conspicuous by its absence, and for a very sufficient reason. His importance in our history is as an ecclesiastic, not a divine, and as an ecclesiastic it is rather as representing officially than as heading and formulating the reaction of the age against State Calvinism. His attitude to the Church of Rome was a mere corollary and consequence of this his general position, and has been even better expressed by others than by himself. In his epistle to the Christian reader prefixed to a remarkable translation of the 'Imitatio Christi' in 1639, a certain William Page, who was afterwards schoolmaster of that very Reading Grammar School where Laud had passed his boyhood, puts this general position with admirable point. After speaking of, and demanding from the general Catholic Church, a conciliatory and reciprocal charity, and a disclaimer of the Romanist dogma confining salvation to their party, he thus concludes:—

"And because I say we are brethren, I would not have you think we like not the cause we have in hand, or that we are ready to yield unto you and presently join hands with you, as some of you imagine, and many of our side causelessly suspect; but this is all—we would have the breach no greater than it is, and would not have the world believe, because we differ in some things, that we agree in none."

But this is to restate from the Anglican side what it is our disappointment and chief complaint to find unstated by "A Recusant" from the Romanist side, and it is therefore needless to quote more.

The History of Trade Unionism. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. (Longmans & Co.)

WITHIN the narrow limits set themselves by the writers this is a valuable contribution to economic history. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb are of opinion that trade unions, properly so called, have been known only from the beginning of the eighteenth century, "before which date we have been unable to discover the existence in the British Isles of anything falling precisely within our definition." Nor have these been much affected, it would seem, by pre-existing types of labour organization, whether native or foreign. "Although it is suggested that analogous associations may have existed during the Middle Ages in various parts of the continent of Europe, we have no reason to suppose that such institutions exercised any influence whatever upon the rise and development of the trade union movement in this country." As to any claim to descent from an even greater antiquity, the Roman collegia opificum, or those shadowy forms of industrial association which modern historical research proves to have existed yet more anciently among people both of the Aryan and Semitic races, with such the authors will have nothing at all to do, their purpose being of a strictly practical kind and rigidly confined to the object immediately in hand.

Under these circumstances it is important to have an early definition of what the authors understand by the term themselves, and this is supplied in the first sentence of the book: "A trade union, as we understand the term," they say, "is a continuous association of wage-earners for the purpose of maintaining or improving the conditions of their employment." Two essential features are immediately apparent in this definition. The association of workers must be a continuous one, and the associated workers must be wage-earners. The former qualification excludes "the innumerable instances in which the manual workers have formed ephemeral combinations against their social superiors"; the latter, "the rebellions of subject races, the slave insurrections, and the semi-servile peasant revolts of which the annals of history are full." A third essential feature is that the association is definitely for the purpose of "improving the conditions of employment"; and in this one the principal distinction between such a body and a friendly society is found to reside.

Equipped for the undertaking with this definition, the reader will thread his way without much difficulty among the elaborate details and very copious references which supply the substance of the following pages. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb are never dull nor tiresome in narrative; it is, on the contrary, a constant marvel how a subject not in itself necessarily attractive, save to experts, can be brightened and rendered generally interesting by a good literary style and lucid mode of treatment such as they both obviously possess. Starting from the year 1700, prior to which they "have failed to discover, either in the innumerable trade pamphlets and broadsheets of the time, or in the Journals of the House of Commons, any evidence of the existence" of trade unionism, they philosophically trace its advent about then to certain industrial peculiarities of the subsequent half century. Its "fundamental condition" belongs "to the economic revolution through which certain industries were passing."

"In all cases in which trade unions arose, the great bulk of workers had ceased to be independent producers, themselves controlling the processes, and owning the materials and the products of their labour, and had passed into the condition of lifelong wage-earners, possessing neither the instruments of production nor the commodity in its finished state."

The development at nearly the same time of the modern factory system was a further result of the same set of causes, and is essentially connected with the same set of considerations. It was not itself a cause either of this form of combination or that revolution in industry.

"It is often assumed that the divorce of the manual worker from the ownership of the means of production resulted from the introduction of machinery and the factory system. Had this been the case we should not, upon our hypothesis, have expected to find trade unions at an earlier date than factories, or in industries untransformed by machinery. The fact that the earliest permanent combinations of wage-earners in England precede the factory system by half a century, and occur in trades carried on exclusively by hand labour, reminds us that the creation of a class of lifelong wage-servants came about in more ways than one."

It was, in point of fact, capitalism, and the spread of a belief in the unlimited efficacy of competition as a means of adjusting industrial relations, that originated the necessity of a correlative force in combination to restore the balance on the labourer's side; and it was the absence from the particular form of it in question of certain functions, familiar to the guild system of labour protection, that resulted in the enactment of the novel body of laws known as factory legislation, which have ever since been assuming an increasing control over material industry. Among problems of the future that await solution, and to which the authors will probably address themselves in the promised sequel to the present work, are the extent to which these and some other functions of the elder institution are properly kept apart, and the manner and degree in which they can be usefully maintained in that attitude towards each other.

The history of trade unionism, thus conceived of, is divided into certain specified epochs, not marking necessarily stages of advance, or, indeed, any orderly progress, but furnishing convenient standpoints from which its erratic development may be readily surveyed. The first of these extends from the origin of the movement, for just a hundred years, to 1799 — or more properly to the enactment of the important laws 39 Geo. III. c. 81 in that year, and of 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 60 in the following year. This legislation was not merely of a highly drastic kind, but, in reality, unprecedented. "There is a clear distinction," say the writers,

"between the various statutes which forbade combination prior to the end of the eighteenth century, and the general Combination Act of 1799. In the numerous earlier Acts recited and repealed in 1824 the prohibition of combination was in all cases incidental to the regulation of the industry. It was assumed to be the business of Parliament and the law courts to regulate the condition of labour; and combinations could, no more than individuals, be permitted to interfere in disputes for which a legal remedy was provided. The object aimed at by the statutes was not the prohibition of combinations, but the fixing of wages, the prevention of embroilment or damage, the enforcement of the contract of service, or the proper arrangements for apprenticeship. And although combinations to interfere with these statutory aims were obviously illegal, and were usually expressly prohibited, it was an incidental result that combinations formed to promote the objects of the legislation, however objectionable they might be to employers, were apparently not regarded as unlawful."

From that time forward for the next quarter of a century they distinctly were so, with the results that usually follow persecution on a large scale, when the scale is, however, not sufficiently large to be all-embracing. Illegal societies took the place of quasi-legal ones, and a common oppression brought about new feelings of fellowship among large portions of the labouring class, hitherto separated by distance, by petty jealousies, and want of sympathy. The authors call this epoch the period of "The Struggle for Existence," and this struggle was much intensified on both sides by the widespread commercial distress which then prevailed — a consequence largely of the artificial inflation of prices produced by long foreign wars. Workmen, hemmed in on all sides, became desperate; while masters and legislators alike grew alarmed at the threatening aspect of affairs. It was no longer sporadic instances of discontent they were called upon to face, but an almost general revolt against the existing law. Just in the very nick of time the workmen secured a leader adequate to the occasion. This was Francis Place, a man of great organizing ability, who from his tailor's shop in London practically directed the subsequent operations in Parliament, Joseph Hume acting as his mouthpiece there. This combination proved irresistible. By their joint endeavours, aided by the pressure of events, a select committee was appointed in 1824 to inquire into the whole subject, the upshot of whose deliberations led ultimately to the total repeal of the obnoxious laws.

The operatives were naturally jubilant at their triumph, and for the next few years the history of trade unionism is the history of increased popular pretensions crowned with continued success. But the masters had by this time learnt the secret of success too, and began to combine on their side. Presently the ominous expression "lock-out" becomes a familiar one in the trade records of the time; and, worse than this, in several pitched battles between the two parties the lockers-out were successful. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb specify two or three influences as being specially operative in tending towards the collapse of trade union agitation at this time. There was the too exaggerated notion of their power, which the unionists had obtained by the speedy repeal of the Combination Laws, and which the remarkable increase in their numbers tended to foster. There was the infusion into their programme of certain extraneous doctrines, partly supplied by Robert Owen and his disciples, and partly incorporated from the political currents of the day, which ran strongly in the direction of parliamentary rather than general social reform; and there was the beginning of the modern co-operative movement. On the differences that subsist between trade unionism and co-operation the authors are, as might be anticipated, at their best. The essentially individualist character of the one and the properly collectivist character of the other are well brought out; nor does this lesson suffer for want of repetition elsewhere throughout the book. The event was a total eclipse for the time of the more lofty pretensions of trade unionism, and its reorganization presently on a different basis.

The story of this new reorganization, which forms another epoch in the development of the subject, and is told under the name of "The New Spirit and the New Model" in chap. iv., carries the narrative down to comparatively recent times. The informing spirit was once again more narrow and exclusive; the objects sought after less ambitious, but more precise. Under the influence of the "New Model" trade unionism "obtained a financial strength, a trained staff of salaried officers, and a permanence of membership hitherto unknown." But the sum total of members declined greatly, and the dreams of a rapid transformation of society faded away.

"Laying aside all projects of Social Revolution, they set themselves resolutely to resist the worst of the legal and industrial oppressions from which they suffered, and slowly built up for this purpose organizations which have become integral parts of the structure of a modern industrial state."

They entered, in fact, on that phase with which the present generation is most familiar, and which persisted until the recrudescence of a more aggressive policy, which, under the name of "The New Unionism," is now dominating their counsels.

This later development of the movement the authors extol at the expense of the old unionism. They attribute its rise to a variety of influences, chief among which they note the publication of Mr. George's "Progress and Poverty" and the Socialist propaganda in its several varieties of the last ten years. The preponderating importance attributed to the first of these agencies is something of a surprise; and, on the other hand, they do not seem to give the full credit due to Karl Marx and his associates for their unwearied efforts in undermining the old school of economics and preaching the solidarity of labour. The name of Mr. Hyndman receives, indeed, honourable mention in this connexion, and a modest reference to the Fabian Society is, no doubt, in excellent taste; but the vast transformation wrought in public opinion by the study of "Das Kapital" is scarcely done full justice to in this way, nor the services of those, its disciples, who strove so long, and so unsuccessfully at first, to convert the English trades unions to their way of thinking.

For the actual tenets of this new faith the reader is referred to the book itself, where they will be found set forth in some detail. Mr. and Mrs. Webb do not attempt to fully analyse them on this occasion, or to estimate their probable effects on the future of that movement of which they have proved themselves capable historians. These endeavours are reserved for the subsequent volume, which it is pleasant to think is now in hand.

Italian Lyrics of To-day. By G. A. Greene. (Mathews & Lane.)

In this work Mr. G. A. Greene strives to convince English readers that not only is there such a thing as a living contemporary Italian literature, but that it is also a fine and good one, daily growing in strength, and by no means to be despised with the superciliousness of ignorance. True, as Mr. Greene himself admits, the years between 1860 and 1870, which saw the making of the Italian nation, seemed to look on at the death throes of Italian literature. The reasons for this were largely political. Literature in Italy for so many years had been the handmaid of politics, trying to awaken a national sentiment, that it is little wonder that it sank exhausted, and almost moribund, on the day when national hopes and struggles were crowned with success. But there was also another cause. Romanticism, always on Italian soil an exotic plant, had turned into a convention, and was devoid of life and power of growth. A reaction was needed. Mr. Greene admirably summarizes the revolt:—

"It must be anti-Catholic, which in Italy means anti-Christian; it must be anti-romantic, which in the Italy of to-day can only be classical, that is Pagan; it must be anti-ascetic, anti-conventional; it must demand freedom for mind and art, now that freedom in the political sphere had been attained. Hence the Veristi, the realists of Italy; hence Carducci's 'Hymn to Satan'; hence Praga and Stecchetti. We may not sympathise with the first ostensible aims of the school; we need not yield unqualified admiration to its 'satanic' or its 'fleshy' work (splendid though it be in form, eloquence, and vigour); yet we may recognise that the revolution was inevitable, we must admit that it has saved literature in Italy; and, finally, if we have any observation and any appreciative faculty, it must be apparent to us that the movement has dowered Italian poetry with new and rich resources; that without abandoning the modern standpoint, it has gone back to the primal sources, to the fountains of the language, to the beauty and purity of the classics, to love of nature, to a free and spontaneous expression of passion and emotion."

These in themselves are great things; and, what is infinitely more, what is infinitely better, they open the way to a greater future. For the violence of insurrection passes away, its results remain; and if the revolt has been against corruption and decay, those results cannot but be for good. And already the period of Storm and Stress draws to its conclusion. It has made room for the development of genius, and to Italy, of old and always, genius has never long been lacking. This, then, is in itself one reason why the Italian poetry of to-day is interesting to the student. What the Third Italy is likely to do in any sphere is a problem worthy of the deepest consideration. The First gave to Europe law, civilization, order, religion, forms of necessary subjection; the Second, besides restoring classical antiquity and the classical traditions, gave us art and literature, summoned like Lazarus from the dead; it endowed us with municipal organization and intellectual independence, forms of necessary freedom. The Third cannot hope to accomplish so much as its predecessors, for its sphere is necessarily limited; but it is Italy still, it is Italy again; let us keep that in view. And literature may, perhaps, be the voice by which it will speak. The field of Italian poetry of to-day is certainly not only fertile, but also remarkable for the character of its productions. It is both rich in promise and rich in achievement. The classical revival of poetry, which our day has witnessed in Italy, is most interesting, and the analogy, not resemblance, with our own revival, very striking. And what makes this classical revival so peculiarly attractive is, to employ a paradox, its eminently modern character. It is thoroughly eclectic, like the age—a medley of North and South, of paganism and modernity, of the literature of life and joyousness and the literature of despair.

In presenting us with his specimen translations Mr. Greene gives them in alphabetical order—no happy device, though in this case it puts to the front the greatest of the younger men, namely, D'Annunzio. "This wonderful boy," whose rapid rise into fame has been one of the astounding phenomena of our century, certainly ranks next to Carducci as the greatest living poet of Italy. He has a good deal of Carducci's clear, sharp-cut way of writing, his brief, strong sentences, and bold metaphors condensed in a few words, conjoined to a lovely and luscious power of melody that the elder poet lacks. In time it is to be hoped that he will, both in verse and prose, outgrow his Zolaism and temper his imitation of Mr. Swinburne. The alphabetical arrangement of Mr. Greene's book is the more to be deplored as he himself is not blind to the regional characteristics of the various writers he quotes, and though these distinctions are tending to disappear, they are still sufficiently marked. Thus the Venetians have an expansive and brilliant note; the Lombards are more prone to brood over the eternal tears of mankind. The Piedmontese are remarkable for their fervour of patriotism and liberal enthusiasm. The Neapolitans burn with the fires of extemporization; the Sicilians are filled with a revolutionary spirit. The Tuscans, Emilians, and Romans must be classed together, for they inherit the majestic traditions of Rome and the ancient purity of the language, and to them naturally belongs the literary movement of the day. After Bologna, which is in the Emilia, the school headed by Carducci, who is a professor at Bologna, has been called the Bolognese School. This name was first bestowed in contempt by Mario Rapisardi, a revolutionary and Socialist poet, rhetorical and verbose, who has placed himself in violent opposition to the literary movement of Northern and Central Italy, and poses as the head of a Sicilian school. The term was applied with the intention of giving the idea that the Bolognese poets were local or provincial in their ways. No accusation could be further from the truth. It is their freedom from narrowness which is their charm, and secures their power in literature and life.

To the merits of Carducci, Mr. Greene does full justice, and in his preface gives a very lucid description of the metres of the 'Odi Barbare,' which are a crux to foreign, and even to Italian readers. He has not rendered the famous 'Hymn to Satan,' that splendid outburst which was the trumpet-blast to Italian literature to revolt, attacking the Church in the name of liberty and reason, and yet withal so dignified that, rightly understood, even a bigot could not call the ode irreverent vituperation. Where Mr. Greene excels is in the rendering of rhymeless poems. This is obvious in his translations of D'Annunzio's 'Evening in May,' Arnaboldi's somewhat rhetorical 'Rhamsees II.,' 'The Birth of Fire,' by Alfredo Bacelli, and, excellent above all, Carducci's 'Ode to the Statue of Victory' at Brescia. It has all the rough clang of the original, which is one of the finest of the 'Odi Barbare.' In translating Stecchetti, Mr. Greene has hardly caught the character of the Stornello, sung before it is written down, a snatch of verse, echoed as it were from the singing of the river or of the birds in the hedgerows. In a short poem, which Mr. Greene calls 'Contempt,' translated from Ersilio Bici, he writes:—

And if they say I drive the cynic's trade,
It is Time's fault, not hers who love betrayed.

Now what does an Italian of the uneducated class know about "cynics"? Tempo in the original means weather; the Italian title is 'Dispetto,' not 'Contempt.' 'Spite' is perhaps nearer the mark; but even this is not the exact term, the meaning of the English word being much more limited than that of the Italian.

The biographical notices which precede

Mr. Greene's translations contain in most cases excellent critical appreciations. Giovanni Marradi shows, perhaps, the highest promise of all the younger poets of the day. There was an amusing interchange of sonnets between him and Panzacchi some years ago, upon the subject of the proper themes for a poet to celebrate. Panzacchi maintained that the ideal is the true theme for a poet. Marradi rejoined in a lovely sonnet, in which he referred to the "icy perfection" of the work of Gautier. Luigi Capuana is, in a sense, the doyen of Italian poets, having been born in 1839. He is a popular novelist as well as a poet. His 'Semiritmi' is an important contribution to poetical literature. "They remind the English reader," says Mr. Greene, "of Walt Whitman, though without the American author's freedom and verve." We should have said they were far removed from any resemblance to Walt Whitman's elaborate roughness. They are refined and polished in the highest degree.

Though by no means complete, Mr. Greene's book ought to do much towards showing that Italy is once more taking her place among the nations that produce good literature.

Le Zend-Avesta. Traduction nouvelle avec Commentaire historique et philologique. Par Prof. J. Darmesteter. 3 vols. "Annales du Musée Guimet," XXI., XXII., XXIV. (Paris, Leroux.)

It was in 1771 that Anquetil-Duperron published his translation of the Zend-Avesta, and thus revealed to the European student the existence of the old religious books of Persia. His discovery was at first discredited; but when Burnouf commenced his researches he soon proved by the close relationship between Zend and Sanskrit that the former was no forgery of Parsi priests, but a true member of the Indo-European family. Since that time Zend has been diligently studied, and every writer on comparative philology, from Bopp down to our latest authority Brugmann, has used the texts of the Avesta as one of his most trusted auxiliaries. But a note of warning has been suddenly sounded from Paris, where Anquetil and Burnouf first made known their discoveries. Prof. Darmesteter has published a new translation with a most ably written introduction, in which he maintains the thesis that not a line of our Avesta text is older than the time of Alexander's conquest, while the greater part belongs to a much later date.

We may briefly remind our readers that, according to the traditional view, the old Zoroastrian books, which belong to the times of the Achemenides, were destroyed at the Macedonian conquest, but that portions were preserved by the people, who retained the old faith during the long period of Arsacidan rule, though the Court favoured Greek civilization. A temporary revival took place under Vologeses, about A.D. 70; but at the accession of the Sassanian dynasty, A.D. 226, when Zoroastrianism was restored as the national religion, all these fragments were diligently sought out and an authoritative text compiled in Ardashir's reign, which contained, in twenty-one Nasks or books, all that then survived of the far larger collection which had existed under the Achæmenids. As Zend was then a dead language, these were translated into the vernacular Pahlavi, and commentaries were also compiled in that language. In the seventh century Islam overran Persia, and but few remained faithful to the old creed, and the sacred books were gradually lost or forgotten, until they dwindled to the fragments which we now possess—scarcely a third of the Sassanian collection. But, according to this view, we still possess the genuine remains of the old pre-Alexandrine literature, mutilated and corrupted during the period of Arsacidan indifference, but yet, so far as they go, a faithful representative of the sacred text of the Achæmenian time; and comparative philology has until now confirmed this view by her successful use of these relics as an important aid in establishing her conclusions.

Prof. Darmesteter, on the contrary, maintains that all our texts are post-Alexandrine in form and in substance. Some may belong to the first century B.C. or A.D., and some, as the legislative parts of the Vendidad, may be founded on older texts now lost; but a large portion was composed by the priests of Ardashir's Court in the third century. The Gâthâs, which till now have been generally considered as the ancient nucleus of the whole system and ascribed to Zoroaster himself, are, in the Professor's opinion, certainly modern, and are relegated to the first century of our era.

In fact, his great attack is directed against the Gâthâs, for with them falls the authenticity of the whole collection, as they are everywhere referred to as an accepted authority. Their special subject is the glorification of Ormazd and his six attendant spirits, the Amshaspands; and these Prof. Darmesteter maintains to have been borrowed from the Alexandrian δυνάμεις, and to be only a development of the idea of the Logos; and he finds similar traces of Neo-Platonism elsewhere. We own that his indictment is drawn up with great skill, and at first sight it might seem to claim a verdict in its favour. But further consideration weakens much of its force, and our own belief is that the Avesta will emerge from this latest attack as triumphantly as it did from the early assaults of Jones in 1771. The great argument for the genuineness of the Avesta is its ancient language, and this of course especially applies to the Gâthâ dialect, which bears to the common Zend a somewhat similar relation to that which Vedic Sanskrit bears to classical Sanskrit. Now it is difficult to believe that Persian priests in the first or the third century of our era could compose such texts in a dead language, and it is still more difficult to suppose their writing the Gâthâs in an earlier form of this dead language and expressing in it a totally new order of religious and philosophical ideas.

To compose successfully new works in a dead language requires great literary skill, and still more to do so in two dead languages. We all know how Chatterton failed when he attempted, without the special training required, to imitate old English ballads; and when our mediæval writers forge Anglo-Saxon charters they may adopt old words and phrases, but their modern spelling and the frequent use of the prefixes and suffixes of their own time enable us almost invariably to detect the forgery.* So Apollonius Rhodius might have seemed to be possessed of all the required conditions for a successful learned imitation of Homer; yet how inevitably even he betrayed himself (incessu patuit) by the awkward way in which the antique dress clung round him and impeded his steps! Can we imagine that these Persian forgers of the early centuries of our era, dealing with two dead languages, the knowledge of which for several centuries had been preserved in priestly families only, with no external encouragement or support, could have achieved such an unparalleled success? Nor, again, must we forget that we have vernacular Pahlavi translations of these very texts made under the Sassanids, which, by their ignorance of Zend grammar and constructions, prove that even common Zend was but partially known; how then could the knowledge of the more ancient dialect have been preserved?

Moreover, is it necessary to suppose an Alexandrian origin for the six Amshaspands? There is, indeed, one passage in Philo (i. 560) where he speaks of the θεῖος λόγος and its five assistant δυνάμεις, ἡ ποιητική, ἡ βασιλική, ἡ ἰλυσ, ἡ προσηλατική, and ἡ ἀναγορευτική; but this is only an isolated mention, and he may very well have introduced it as a borrowed idea which suited his immediate purpose of finding an allegorical meaning in the six cities of refuge, but had no permanent use in his system. Alexandria would be the very place to receive such a stray seed wafted from Persia, and Philo the very mind to appropriate it. The idea of the Logos is, of course, always present with him, and he sometimes mentions it with its two attendants, ἡ ποιητική and ἡ βασιλική, while in other places (as in ii. 19) these two seem themselves to represent the Logos, and to stand on the right and left of the Supreme. But it is more reasonable to connect this personification of the divine attributes with the Noûs of Anaxagoras than with any Eastern speculations.

The Persian Amshaspands may very well claim a different relationship. Why should they not be developments of that old Vedic mysticism which evolved the idea of the goddess Speech (ῥέ) and so many other female abstractions? Vâc says of herself ('Rigveda,' x. 125, 3):—

"I am the queen, the collectress of treasures, the first knower of things to be worshipped; as such the gods have set me in many places, abiding in many conditions and entering into many forms."

In the same way we find in the Goddess Aramati of the 'Rigveda' distinct foreshadowings of the Zend Aramaiti (Plutarch's σοφίας δημιουργός), especially in v. 43, 6, "bring hither, O Agni, consenting to our desire, the mighty divine matron Aramati, to whom we offer libations with reverence"; and again in x. 92, 4:—

"The extension of Right [ῥitasya=asha], the wide space of heaven, Adoration, the great, the most glorious Aramati—Indra, Mitra, and Varuna have shone forth together, and Bhaga also and Savitri—all beings of purified wisdom."

* Thus a forged charter of Ethelred of Wessex (967-971) has the forms enamed, mekel, and was i-scriben for A.-S. ge-named, mece, and was ge-scriben (Kemble's 'Cod. Dipl.', vol. II. p. 97).

In four places Aramati is called maht, which our modern exegesis explains as "great," but Hindu tradition renders it "earth," which agrees with the Avesta doctrine that Aramaiti has the earth under her special care.

But while we thus withhold assent from Prof. Darmesteter's main thesis, we yield him unstinted praise for his excellent work. One of its main features is that in the third volume he has collected from Pahlavi literature a very large number of quotations from the lost Nasks, which supply important materials for Zend lexicography. Instead of the nine fragments printed in Westergaard's edition he has given more than two hundred, and he has also printed from Pahlavi quotations nearly two-thirds of the tenth Nask, the Aspdrām, on the education and the duties of a priest.

A new and complete translation of the Avesta fills the first and second volumes. His previous translation in the Oxford series of the "Sacred Books of the East" had only included the Vendidad and the Yashts*; he now adds a translation of the Yaçna and the Gâthâs. Since the publication of the first translation he has visited Bombay and profited by direct intercourse with the learned Parsi priests. He has thus studied the native tradition at the fountain head; and he has had peculiar opportunities of learning the rites and ceremonies which are still kept up, and which will certainly throw a new light on many parts of a book which is so closely connected with ritual. We therefore hail this new translation as a valuable addition to our materials for solving the many problems which the Avesta offers, even while we hesitate to accept its guidance implicitly. Every Zend student must henceforth consult it as one of his recognized authorities, but to be compared with and controlled by the results of European scholarship, just as the Vedic student gratefully acknowledges Sayana's valuable help even when he ventures to correct his interpretation by Grassmann and Ludwig.

NEW NOVELS.

Thou art the Man. By the Author of 'Lady Audley's Secret.' 3 vols. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

THE last of Miss Braddon's plots is not one of the most ingenious or natural. The new murderer is a little too undiscriminating, and the new mysteries are too elaborately artificial. But there is plenty of them; the author never stints her readers of plot and developing incidents. The crimes of these three volumes (exceptionally atrocious ones) are complicated by a strain of epileptic tendencies, in the treatment of which Miss Braddon shows no slight skill. Of course there are some gruesome passages in 'Thou art the Man.' The hereditary epileptic wakes up on one occasion in a wood, and

"his hand touched another hand, his fingers closed automatically on the soft fabric of a woman's gown.....he clutched that cold and stiffening hand.....the hand that had been lying on her breast was wet and dabbled with blood.....that thick and viscous fluid which covered his clammy fingers and trickled about his wrist."

Somebody comes upon the scene at what is undoubtedly a very awkward moment for the unfortunate man, and naturally enough he never hears the last of it. But much of the story is lighter and pleasanter reading than this particular incident.

* The Yaçna with the Gâthâs was translated by Dr. Mills.

A Cumberer of the Ground. By Constance Smith. 3 vols. (Methuen & Co.)

THREE closely printed volumes about people who treat themselves—or are treated by their creator—with portentous seriousness require a great deal of reading and a robustly cheerful spirit. Miss Smith dedicates something more than a sonnet (fully two pages, in fact) to the leading lover's eyelashes and personal appearance generally. The rest of the story is on the same scale of elaborate and minute description. The fortunes of Lyon, Travers, and the object of their young affections are not exhilarating in themselves, nor are they treated with a light hand. Never was love-making more solemn than that between Lyon and Dorothy, both before and after the conscientious folly of the heroine drove her deliberately to marry the wrong man, and thereby to produce unnecessary annoyances for all parties. The shipwreck is good, and the struggle with a mad dog is a spirited and less hackneyed episode. For the rest it must be confessed that 'A Cumberer of the Ground' is not entertaining, and that art itself is decidedly less long.

A Bachelor's Bridal. By Mrs. Lovett Cameron. (White & Co.)

"Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?" A question implicitly asked in the tragedy before us, although the short reaction that so disastrously affected the course of passion is also natural enough. There is much to excuse the middle-aged solicitor and club-man for the temporary mistake he made in the diagnosis of his case. To have his bachelor sanctum suddenly invaded at midnight, even by an angel of grace and beauty, and to be compelled to instant matrimony to save the angel's honour, were causes enough to produce a cold fit in such a model of conventionality. Yet the only impulse which prompted the action might have enlightened him as to his true feelings. Poor Enid's is a less common case, for surely a single interview, even under romantic circumstances, was a slender basis for such an abandonment of affection. But fortunately for men the best of women can idealize rapidly. In Mrs. Challenger, Valentine Bryant's friend and counsellor, who is so justly indignant at the apparent treachery which threatens to terminate her reign, we find a more complex character. The interview in which Valentine has to confess and plead for the absolution which the shrewd but kindly matron finally accords is cleverly described. Altogether this is a readable trifle, though the catastrophe is unduly harrowing.

A Foolish Marriage. By Annie S. Swan. (Hutchinson & Co.)

This is a stupid book, purporting to be about student life in Edinburgh, but it may very reasonably be doubted if the medical student in any town is like any of the three depicted here. Their conversations have no verisimilitude, and their actions, especially those of the traitor Brobner, are unreasonable and uninteresting. The heroine is one of those dreary young women who battle bravely against adversity; why they should always be so dull in a novel is a sad mystery, but it is so; and needless to say there is the familiar figure of our old friend the lodging-house slavey, who is untidy, but worth her weight in gold. Miss Swan is overwriting herself; she used not to produce weak stuff of this sort, which almost anybody devoid of imagination and experience might write.

Doctor Quodlibet. By the Author of 'Chronicles of Westery,' &c. (London-hall Press.)

THERE is an excellent portrait in this book of a delightful old bishop, whose saintly character is not rendered disagreeable by a lack of worldly wisdom, or a want of sympathetic tenderness to weakness of moral fibre, and distress begotten of crime. The pages describing his visits to the poorer clergy of his diocese, and his fatherly care of his godchild—in fact, all those in which he or his wife appears—are charming, for they avoid all the maudlin sentimentality too often associated with descriptions of goodness. They have in them the ring of truth in their portrait of a man happily not very uncommon in real life, but lamentably so in fiction. The contrast to him is also well worked out in the unhappy Meredith, "who didn't believe in himself or in his own powers of achievement or endurance, and so he never put them to the test." Perhaps the rest of the story is rather too crude. The villain is of that exaggerated type who bets, commits forgery, and beats his wife; and the explanation of Dr. Seigerson's mysterious conduct in transferring Tit-Rite to his rival's person, though certainly full of "actuality," almost turns the whole business into a farce. However, there is not much cause of complaint, but much of gratitude to the anonymous author.

Young Sam and Sabina. By Tom Cobbleigh. "Pseudonym Library." (Fisher Unwin.)

TOM COBBLEIGH wisely confines himself to the scene of his former success in 'Gentleman Upcott's Daughter,' the rich pasture country of Somersetshire, of which the very dialect seems to have caught the languorous charm. There is not very much in the story; it is just the old tale of lovers' misunderstandings which are eventually adjusted; but so far as it goes it is pleasing, and besides it gives an opening for descriptions of some of the quaint and crabbed inhabitants of the isle of Middeney. There is a great deal of humour in many of the incidents and of the characters, and among them the most amusing, perhaps, is old Sam Grinter, of whom one made a deadly enemy for life by refusing his hospitality; "there was nothing that admirable man resented so much, except being crossed in argument, or, as he expressed it, 'to be made out a fool.'" Christopher Chiselett's astuteness in his dealings with the commercial traveller also is comic in the time-honoured way, and the dead donkey is, at any rate, a novel and audacious cause of quarrel. The only inharmonious note in the book is Christopher's meanness to Sophia Sharman; it may be true to nature, but it jars with a too serious note on the pastoral peace of the village idyl. A short passage may be given as an example of one of Tom Cobbleigh's quaintly characteristic little incidents:—

"Sabina passed on. For the first time Sam's eyes lighted on her with more than common meaning as he watched her easy erect figure softened in the morning mist. He smiled; stepped into the road; and from the wayside selected a small clod of earth, about so big as a little crab-apple or a bantam pullet's egg, and threw it, striking Sabina fairly between the shoulders on the curtain of her white sun-bonnet. Without turning she looked back over her shoulder and laughed. It was an attention, and Sabina liked attentions dearly. And so Sam fell in love."

Laura Arbuthnot. By John Meredith. (Sonnenachein & Co.)

THE heroine of Mr. John Meredith's novel is a woman with a past, animated with the desire to prove to the world, in the author's words, that one "who had stumbled and fallen was not of necessity lamed and made impotent for life." The failure, through no particular fault of her own, of this laudable scheme is worked out plausibly and even naturally enough, though the effectiveness of the story is, no doubt, considerably discounted by the fact that it moves on much the same lines as a recent and much discussed play of Mr. Pinero's.

James Inwick, Ploughman and Elder. By P. Hay Hunter. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

A book must be very good indeed to excuse its being written entirely in a rather difficult Scotch dialect, for it is undoubtedly a great labour for the Southron to read it with comprehension. In this case, however, we are inclined to say that Mr. Hunter has justified himself for imposing so great a burden on his readers, as his book is very amusing, and the amusement is to a large extent due to the personal character of the narrative. True, some reminiscences of Mr. Barrie's works in dialect are suggested by 'James Inwick,' but not unduly so, as the book has a distinct line of its own. A simple Scotch kirk elder narrates his experiences of disestablishment, which are very funny, and describes with great naïveté the ingenious method by which the Radical member for the constituency nobbles him. But, of course, to justify the dialect there is a good deal more than this—to wit, some highly amusing conversations with his village cronies, who are at once jealous of his promotion and scornful of his want of decision. The sketches of the important local celebrities, such as An'ra Wabster and Archie Howden, are exceedingly lifelike and humorous; and there is some very clever satire in the account of Mr. Tod-Lowrie, Q.C., M.P.'s elaborate mystification of the simple voters. A further distinct advantage which the use of the dialect gives is the scope it affords for picturesque words which roll sonorously in the utterance and have hardly any equivalent in English: "the haill clamjamfrey o' them," for example, and "there was unco stramash on the heid o't," may be picked out as particularly picturesque expressions. It is certainly remarkable that such a clever book should have been written by the author of 'The Silver Bullet,' which showed no extraordinary marks of ability.

Les Demi-Vierges. Par Marcel Prévost.
(Paris, Lemerre.)

The two new novels which are being the most talked about in Paris are both of them, unfortunately, strong meat for us. They are 'Le Lys Rouge,' by M. Anatole France, which has been appearing in La Revue de Paris, and that now before us—M. Marcel Prévost's 'Les Demi-Vierges,' who are "vierges" only as the "demi-monde" is society. In spite of the naughtiness of the fifth and last part of 'Le Lys Rouge,' M. Anatole France, however, still writes as becomes the self-respect of a future academician. In the work before us, on the other hand, M. Marcel Prévost has indeed descended into the depths, and, although he poses as a Juvenal, seems to have had in view the immense sale provoked by public scandal. He suggests that half-virgins—a minority, he admits, among the young ladies of France, and even of Paris—are more numerous in other countries, which is, we hope, a libel as regards the English-speaking and the Teutonic worlds, at least. Perhaps M. Marcel Prévost does not know, and only guesses for the sake of effect; perhaps, on the other hand, he may have enjoyed the advantages of a tourist ticket to hospitable Leicester Square, if not to the scornful Berlin, or the distant Washington and New York.

Il Trionfo della Morte. By Gabriele D'Annunzio. (Milan, Treves.)

'IL TRIONFO DELLA MORTE' is yet another of the emanations of Signor Gabriele D'Annunzio's perverse imagination. The story, told in great detail in 500 closely printed pages, deals with the sensual appetites of a man and woman who seem bereft of ties and duties. Satiety finally produces melancholy, and the man kills the woman and himself from sheer weariness of pleasure. The novel is the more insidious as it is written with all that magic of language Signor D'Annunzio so well knows how to wield. The fact that it contains some exquisite, if slightly luscious descriptions of nature, and an admirable word-picture of Casalbordino, the resort of pilgrims, does not suffice to redeem it from censure.

SOME IRISH BOOKS.

A Cluster of Nuts. By Katharine Tynan (Mrs. H. A. Hinkson). (Lawrence & Bullen.)

Lost on Du Corrig. By Standish O'Grady. (Cassell & Co.)

The Story of Ireland. Same author. (Methuen.)

The Bog of Stars; and other Stories of Elizabethan Ireland. Same author. "The New Irish Library." (Fisher Unwin.)

Irish Druids and Old Irish Religions. By James Bonwick, F.R.G.S. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

Misther O'Riyan: an Incident in the History of a Nation. By Edward M'Nulty. (Arnold.)

Mrs. HINKSON is a lyric poet, and her prose, like her verse, is near to the heart of nature, sweet with the smell of fresh grass and flowering thorn, and warm with a tender sympathy that embraces all things that live and die, but that goes out more fully to trees and fields and summer skies than to men and women. As a secondary title, Mrs. Hinkson defines her collected stories as "being sketches among my own people," and this they are; but even more truly are they sketches of her own country, and with an unconscious likening of all things to the flowers and hills she loves so well. She tells us again and again of an old face "like a grey rock," and a young face "like a rose." Thus it is the look of things which first appeals to Mrs. Hinkson; and even so grim a story as 'A Farmer's Tragedy' opens with a landscape:—

"It is a year since I met that mournful procession going home by the green lanes. The black-birds sang in mad rivalry just the same: croak, croak, went the cornerake, the harsh voice of summer; the meadows were turning brown, yellow iris was springing on her green flaggers; the Hawthorn, as now, was turning to pink, making every bush look a more lavish bower of little roses than Botticelli's Spring herself could furnish forth. Such a divine, dewy, green evening with the fragrance of a censor in the air."

Not so does a prose writer who has what work-a-day folk call a "grip on the realities of life" begin a tragic story, but Mrs. Hinkson is a true singer, and the realities of the songster are the realities of the child—summer and light; blue sky and fleecy clouds; birds, butterflies, and the flowers in the hedgerows. These are the foregrounds of her charming pictures, and the human figures complete them only as human figures complete the compositions of a landscape painter: our hearts are not wrung by their hazy tragedies; their dim griefs add nothing to our experience of life. Vaguely sad, pleasantly pathetic, are the stories that might have been deeply tragic seen from another point of view, and for this reason we prefer those that are memories of childhood, for the standpoint of Mrs. Hinkson is the standpoint of every natural, healthy, dreamy child. The cup-moss, the fairy rings, the tame pigeon, and the apple trees are life's realities, and the love tragedies of the grown-up folk are as the Greek mythology will be in twenty years to come: she is never too much absorbed in them to refrain from the playful yet wistful digressions that make up so much of the charm of this 'Cluster of Nuts.'

From Mrs. Hinkson to Mr. Standish O'Grady is a far cry, for the best of the three books by this indefatigable writer is nothing that the poet is, and everything that she is not. 'Lost on Du Corrig' is a boy's book of adventure: one of the baldest, simplest, and most convincing that it has ever been our lot to read. Written with a simplicity that is doubly admirable from an author who seldom writes very simply, this story of the loss of Jack Freeman, the search that was made for him, and his life in the natural cave is (for all its far-fetched improbability) so wonderfully truthful that we believe in the Freeman family, and even in such minor characters as the scapegrace Pat Melody and the police inspector, long after we have closed the book. The boys themselves are supposed to tell the tale, and their narrative is managed with great art, for while nothing is omitted that is essential to an understanding of their characters and their adventures, nothing is described. Yet, as Mr. O'Grady himself remarks in his character of editor,

"the warm mutual affection of the brothers, the primitive character of the neighbourhood, and the simplicity of the home life of the Freeman family, which are pleasantly and naturally suggested rather than elaborately described in their various communications, are such as I myself, though a seasoned littérateur, felt convinced that I could not reproduce with anything like the freshness and vividness of their unlaboured compositions."

Fresh and vivid indeed is this exciting story, and men, women, and girls as well as boys will find pleasure in reading the well-told adventures of the plucky Irish boy.

But if 'Lost on Du Corrig' hits more marks than it was aimed at, 'The Story of Ireland' is, in revenge, a miss; it begins like a history for children, it ends as a particularly uninteresting personal reminiscence, and is without historic or literary value. The first chapters, treating of the early history of Ireland, are neither better nor worse than some score of 'Short Histories' and 'Students' Manuals' already in the field; but in the eighteenth century the historian, though still writing for a juvenile public, drifts from serious history into playful anecdote. This chapter is entitled 'Waking up the Gentry,' and Swift is introduced to us in this manner:—

"Dean Swift, though a great man, was also a great wag, as any one can perceive by reading his celebrated story 'Gulliver's Travels.' A vast number of funny stories are still told about him in Ireland. Once at a country inn hairy butter was set before the Dean. Swift called up the landlady and thus addressed her, 'My dear Mrs. Cusack, there is nothing I like so much myself as hairy butter, and yours is indeed hairy, hairy in the extreme. Yet at the same time, my dear lady, I have a fancy for being myself the mixer. Please then in future send up the hair on one plate and the butter upon another, and I shall mix them myself. That is all. Now you may go down.' Another day an over-roasted sirloin was set before him. He rang the cook up. There was a large company sitting at table. 'Jane,' he said, with the most serious air, 'this sirloin is overdone. Take it down and do it less.'"

It is the misfortune of the Saxon to see more savagery than wit in these "funny ways" and "jokes and pranks," but Mr. O'Grady, having drifted into anecdote, becomes more and more discursive; the personal pronoun makes its appearance in the chapter on O'Connell, while chap. xxxi. is devoted to reminiscences of "Parnell," narrated in the first person. "When I first saw him," "All that I noticed was," "I saw him next," "I had read somewhere in a newspaper," these phrases begin as many sentences in the opening thirteen lines of the chapter, and in the next page we are told:—

"The agent Kerr, now dead, stopped to speak with me. I knew him slightly. Then he suddenly introduced me to his companion; I had not previously recognised him. There on the hillside I had some ten minutes' conversation with Parnell, who, however, did nearly all the talking. I felt as if I were handling the most delicate china, requiring super-sensitiveness of touch lest something might crack, or as if I were dealing with a very delicate and fragile lady out for her first drive after sickness. I was no friend to his politics, but I confess that I liked the man extremely, and a few weeks afterwards felt inexpressibly shocked when I heard the Dublin newsboys crying about the streets, 'Death of Mr. Parnell.'"

The next and final chapter is devoted to "Parnell's Personality," and is treated in a manner which we will illustrate by quotation:—

"Again I state a fact: it was witnessed by thousands. While his followers were committing Charles Parnell's remains to the earth, the sky was bright with strange lights and flames. Only a coincidence, possibly; and yet persons not superstitious have maintained that there is some mysterious sympathy between the human soul and the elements. Some perhaps will be disappointed that, like Mr. Lecky and Mr. Froude and other great historians, I don't enlarge somewhat on Home Rule. But I don't think any man can be a historian and politician at the same time. So, with friendly greetings to friendly readers and not unfriendly to those who are not, I conclude this unconventional and loosely-flowing, but, I hope, readable 'Story of Ireland.'"

'The Bog of Stars' is less loosely flowing and also less readable; indeed, it is surprising how a writer who can invent so lifelike a story as 'Lost on Du Corrig' from a worn-out theme can treat the really fine stories of Elizabethan Ireland with so little fire and imagination. Clearly Mr. O'Grady's fancy rebels at the restraints imposed by history, and he is at his best where he is most unfettered.

Mr. Bonwick's volume on Irish Druids is full of interesting information collected from many sources: it is less a book than notes for a book, and as such will appeal chiefly to students, who cannot fail to find pleasure and instruction in its pages.

The days are past when Irishmen boasted of being descendants of the kings, but Irishmen are still candid on the subject of their virtues, their talents, and their wit; and the Saxon who goes among them must be prepared to have his acknowledgments of their greatness forestalled by his reader companions. In private and in public this rule holds good; in conversation and on the platform the Irishman is the most self-laudatory of creatures, yet, when he takes a pen in his hand, he veers round completely, and seldom writes a good word of his race, his country, or the party to which he belongs. Most of the spiteful things that have been written of Ireland were written by her sons, and the literary Irishman is as merciless to the foibles as to the grave faults of his race. Mr. McNulty's picture of rural Ireland is amusing, but exceedingly ill-natured; he knows his Ireland thoroughly, but some of the fruit of the tree of knowledge is bitter. Not that we quarrel with Mr. McNulty on this account, for bitterness is not displeasing in literature, and the character drawn with the most animus—that of the agitator Ignatius O'Ryan—is the best; for though it is an almost farcical caricature of the worst type of Land League organizer, it represents a kind of braggart familiar to every one who knows Ireland, and the creature is sketched with wit and spirit, and embellished by one of the best brogues ever put on paper. On the other hand, Father Pat Murphy is no more like a bad priest than a child's drawing on a slate is like an ugly human being; maybe he is a study from the life, but he is neither typical nor lifelike, and it would take much to persuade us that the Maynooth authorities would accept a student who had an illegitimate son and a deserted mistress thrown unprovided on the world. Bad priests there are, but not of this type; moreover, Father Pat is introduced to us as "idolized" and "admired" by the flock among whom he has lived a quarter of a century; yet from cover to cover this popular priest never speaks a kind word nor does a charitable act: he has won the heart of Ballycusha by tyranny, rapacity, and hard drinking. In a brief note the author disclaims any intention of discussing the merits of any form of political opinion, and it must be admitted that he is impartial with his rascals; for Farmer Kennedy, who refuses to join the League and is boycotted in consequence, is little better than his persecutors, and Blake the landlord is a rack-renter. Altogether we find ourselves in very bad society, and should be ashamed to confess that it is amusing; but all save the love interest is well told, and if the personages themselves are overdrawn, the tongue they speak and the atmosphere they breathe are truly Irish.

PARISH COUNCILS.

MR. EPTINGHAM WILSON publishes The Law of District and Parish Councils, being the Local Government Act, 1894, with the Acts referred to in it, by Mr. John Lithiby, a large volume which is open to the same objections as the others on the same subject which we have lately noticed, although it has the merits of the best of them. As an example of the fact, to which we have repeatedly alluded, that these explanatory handbooks do not make the law more clear than it is in the Act itself, we would refer to p. 31, where we read, "A woman is not disqualified by marriage.....for being an elector of any local authority," a statement which is untrue. A woman is disqualified by marriage from being an elector of a town council, which is a local authority. She is disqualified by marriage from being a county elector; and it is being agreed in the present session of Parliament that she is not to be so disqualified in Scotland—an absurdity, but yet so. This error in Mr. Lithiby's book arises from the fact that in his comment he has neglected the words of the statute—"for the purposes of this Act." Another point in which Mr. Lithiby seems to have gone a little wrong is in his account of small parishes and the application of Parish Councils to them. At p. 40 he seems in one place to have put the figure of 200 for that of 300. We are aware that both are used in the Act, the latter in one place by oversight, a consequential amendment not having been made in the House of Lords to meet an amendment which their lordships had inserted. But it is a parish with less than 300 which must, if it insists, receive a Parish Council, and not, as Mr. Lithiby suggests, a parish with less than (or, as we should prefer, fewer than) 200. Another error is in the account of the application of the Act to London—the statement that there will be no ex-officio members of the Vestry. This is rather a bad mistake, as the matter was very fully discussed on several occasions and much public attention called to it. We admit, however, that but for the discussion the Act would not in itself have seemed clear upon the point, as it is true that the provisions of the section which says that there shall be no ex-officio members of urban sanitary authorities would perhaps seem to be applied in this matter to London by some of the words in section 31. When carefully read, however, it will be found that they do not apply, and that the incumbent and churchwardens continue to be ex-officio members; and this view is confirmed by the repeal schedule. The author's note on p. 125 seems to show that he thinks that the provisions of the Act with respect to the persons to be elected as urban District Councillors which are applied to London are those contained in the first sub-section of clause 23. That is not so. The reference is to sub-section 2, which abolishes both the qualification of electors and the qualification of members.

MESSRS. STEVENS & SONS publish The Law relating to Parish Councils, by Mr. George Humphreys, a large volume which is exactly that which on its title-page it professes to be, namely, "The Local Government Act, 1894, with an appendix of statutes, and an introduction, notes, orders, and circulars of the Local Government Board, and a copious index." Although this is a more showy publication than are the handbooks which we have hitherto noticed, we cannot say that it contains more information. But, from the fact that it is in large type and printed on thick paper, it will probably be a favourite with clerks of authorities for use in the board-room. We have not up to the present time found in it any errors.

Hadden's Handbook on the Local Government Act, 1894, published by Messrs. Hadden, Best & Co., appears to be a useful publication, and it gives in appendices the whole of the incorporated sections of the statutes referred to in the Act, together with the circulars and orders of the Local Government Board relating to it. The difficult point about the electoral position of women under the Act, to which we have referred in noticing other publications upon it, is not made clear. This handbook says that, in its observations on local government franchises as applicable to parochial electors, it is to be understood that women, if they possess the requisite qualifications, are entitled to be registered as well as men. The statement, it will be seen, is a guarded one, and, as so guarded, is true. But we fear that it will be almost universally misunderstood, because there follows a list of qualifications, including the lodger qualification and the various ownership qualifications, which do not apply to women, and which may be easily misread as doing so.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

LIKE the other volumes of the "Badminton Library" (Longmans & Co.), Yachting is very much of the nature of an encyclopedia of its subject, gaining in completeness, though losing in artistic effect, by the number of the authors, which is here even greater than usual—a division of labour not to be regretted when each one is a recognized authority. When Mr. G. L. Watson writes on the 'Evolution of the Modern Racing Yacht,' or Thalassa on 'Racing Rules' and 'Small Yacht Racing,' we read as pupils rather than as critics; and when Lord Brassey discusses on 'Ocean Cruising,' or Mr. Knight on 'Fitting out a Fifty-Tonner to go Foreign,' we know that we have the opinion of men whose experience has rendered them competent to form one. Sir George Leach's 'Recollections of Schooner Racing' is one of those pleasantly written chapters which, for the moment, throw back the shadow on the dial, and make the old young again; and the extraordinary interest excited last year by the Vigilant-Valkyrie races for the America Cup fully warranted an account of them being placed on permanent record. Altogether the book—letterpress and illustrations—is delightful. If we have any criticism to offer, it is on the introduction, which is not quite in keeping with the rest of the matter. Sir Edward Sullivan is a pleasant writer whom we are always glad to meet; but his speculations or suggestions as to the advantages and capabilities of a sailing battleship of 10,000 tons and a speed of thirty knots—alike, it would appear, in calm or storm, in the wind's eye or in any other direction—though a bit of "admirable fooling," are perhaps just a little out of place where they are.

In Nigh on Sixty Years at Sea (Digby, Long & Co.) Capt. Robert Woodward, or—as he seems to prefer it—"Old Woodward," tells the story of his life and adventures, setting down, he says, only "the things that really occurred," things that, "besides being strange, are true." Why Capt. Woodward, who first went to sea in 1840, should, when writing in 1893, describe himself as having been at sea "nigh on sixty years," is not quite evident. A similar inaccuracy prevails throughout. He says, for instance, that he brought the Meteor home from the Crimea, and on arriving at Spithead in time to see the naval review in August, 1856, he found "old Charlie Napier" in command. As an illustration of passing history the book has no value; but as a chronicle of stories new and old, original and hearsay, it is not bad reading, and may very well serve to while away an idle hour.

MR. G. M. THEAL'S contribution to the "Story of the Nations"—South Africa (Fisher Unwin)—is, from every point of view, one of the most valuable numbers yet issued. A careful and accurate narrative was to have been expected from the laborious author who has devoted the best years of his life to the study and compilation of South African history in all its branches; but the pleasantly readable character of this book and its generally attractive style are somewhat of a surprise, for to be saturated with knowledge of a subject is not always the best preparation for treating it within strictly limited lines. Yet it may safely be said that a more interesting outline history has never been produced than this story of the colonization of South Africa from the same hand that has written it out at large to the extent of five octavo volumes. There are manifest disadvantages inseparable from a closely condensed method of dealing with such varying nationalities and interests as those involved in the march of events from the establishment of a "Refreshment Station" on the Cape Peninsula to the building of Fort Salisbury in Mashonaland; but, taking the times and people as they go, no writer more impartial than Mr. Theal, and equally competent, could have been readily found for this particular piece of work. His long history has been dealt with seriatim so fully in these columns that it is not necessary to add more than a word concerning the illustrations, which, though rough, are more helpful than those generally given under like circumstances.

AN article by M. Alfred Spoot on the French navy under Charles VIII., which appeared in the April number of the Revue des Questions Historiques, contains some new points in connexion with English history, derived partly from the French archives and partly from our own records. That Bristol was sacked in 1484 and several of the inhabitants carried off by a French squadron which had previously gained the victory over certain English ships off the coast of Brittany is a fact that seems to have escaped the notice of the local historian. This may be regarded as an evidence of the weakness of the English Government under Richard III. The paper also contains some further notices of Perkin Warbeck.

THE Italian lady who writes under the pseudonym of Cordelia has followed up her books of advice to women, 'Il Regno della Donna' and 'Dopo la Nozza,' with 'I nostri Figli' (Milan, Treves), a volume intended to prove a guide in the rearing and education of children. All matters bearing on this question are still in so elementary a stage of philosophical development in Italy that, in order to be just to the author, we have to bear this fact in mind. Were the book in English, we should dismiss it as well-intentioned twaddle; but for Italians these chapters can still prove useful. The writer's intentions are excellent. Unfortunately she has not grasped the fact that it is only by instilling general principles that we can fortify children to meet the perils of life. Cordelia's love of children and thoughtful mind have led her to form correct notions of the educational results most to be desired; but her lack of scientific culture conduces to errors of judgment. With her intimate knowledge of the ways of children, and her patient endeavours to impress her views on parents whose instincts are not so wise as her own, it is truly a pity that she does not build these views on a sound substratum of physiological study.

TO MADAME CARNOT.

"When the President reached Dijon he had the happiness to find awaiting him on the railway platform his son, the Lieutenant, and his daughter and son-in-law, with their little daughter, a sweet child of four. The grandfather took her into his carriage, and embraced her affectionately, and said how much more pleasant it would be to get out and stay at Dijon with her than to go on to Lyons. His eyes filled with tears as he gave her the parting kiss, and handed her to her father."—Daily News, June 25th, 1894.

AT Dijon gleamed on that bright countenance—Illumed by love of thee and love of those Who sprang from thee—tears born of coming woes.

The sad prophetic Spirit of joyous France
Wept too, methinks, to see her son advance
To death; and when he kissed the child there rose

That sight the Future's mirror sometimes shows,
The mother-land in grip of Fate or Chance.

"Daughter," saith France to thee, "this day of sorrow

Wins for his threatened land a sunnier morrow:
His was the death could save me—not another:
For me thy dear one robbed thee of his life—
For me fought bosom bare—yea, met the knife Hell whetted for the bosom of his Mother."

THEODORE WATTE.

AN UNKNOWN "BALADE" BY CHAUCER.

I AM sorry that Dr. Skeat did not pay me the compliment of reading my letter a little more carefully. If I had meant to put forward any philological "tests," as destructive of the Chaucerian authorship of the Balade, I should have said so; but I said nothing of the kind. The shortness of the poem and the choice of rhymes leave us nothing to test it by. Late in the fifteenth century a scribe attributed it to Chaucer. He may have done so out of his own head, in which case the attribution is valueless. But it is more likely that he copied an earlier ascription, and as we may not deny that a poem is Chaucer's merely because it is rather poor, the MS. authority turns the scale, and we cannot seriously contest it, though I think that we do Chaucer more honour by doubting than by belief. I mentioned my own low opinion of the merits of the Balade as an excuse for my sluggishness in not communicating it at once to the Athenæum, or, as I would gladly have done had I attached more importance to it, to Prof. Skeat personally. To support my opinion, lest I should seem discourteous to my betters by differing without giving a reason, I gave three instances of "shortcomings." In one of these we find the poet driven to neglect an e final, about which he is exceptionally careful; in the others he resorts to the use of "stopgaps." As regards one of these, Prof. Skeat retorts that "there are many examples of its use to fill up a line, especially in the 'House of Fame,' where it is sometimes quite otiose." I am not aware, however, that any one has yet claimed for these lines, as Prof. Skeat claims for the Balade, that they are examples (the Balade is to be held "the most complete example") of Chaucer's "mastery over the technicalities of rhythm." Instead of addressing himself to prove this, Dr. Skeat treats my instances of laboured rhythm as linguistic "tests," and then remarks that he "cannot go into the question of metre," as "it will be time enough to do that when any parallel example can be found." But in my letter there was no question about metre. A poet does not show his "mastery over the technicalities of rhythm" merely by his choice of a difficult metre, but by writing in it with ease and grace, and it is just this ease and grace that appeared to me to be conspicuously lacking in the newly found poem.

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

LONDONERS AND THE CHASE.

WHEN one thinks what German scholars would have made of the early history of London, had it been their capital city, one would wonder at the apathy here concerning it, if it were not for the small encouragement, among ourselves, for genuine original research. For its great charter from Henry I. historians have given us, in complacent succession, a wrong reading, an erroneous date, and a mistaken interpretation. The English charter of the Conqueror is a document familiar to us all, and that in favour of his "man" Deorman, which keeps it company at the Guildhall, "has for centuries," Mr. Loftie writes, "been an object of interest to historians and antiquaries. There is not," he adds, "so far as I can remember, a single English document, so short and so plain, which has given rise to so many misreadings and mistaken explanations." But while writing on these familiar documents—facsimiles of which are now given as the frontispiece to Dr. Sharpe's 'London and the Kingdom'—historians, so far as I can find, have overlooked an English writ of the Conqueror, which, for the light it throws on a very difficult problem, is of the highest value.

This writ was printed by Hickee in the preface to his 'Thesaurus' (p. xvi), from a copy of it made for him by the keeper of the Cottonian MSS., among which it then was. From this book it was taken by the editors of the new 'Monasticon'; but to print a document, one often finds, is not to make it known.

Hickee, unfortunately, gives no reference, nor does he tell us whence is taken the Latin form of the writ. If the document comes from a cartulary (I cannot find it now among the Cotton charters), both the old English and the Latin forms may—as in the case, known to me, of another of William's writs—be there given. The Latin form quantum valet runs thus:—

"Willelmus rex Golafrido vicecomiti et ceteris Londoniensibus fidelibus suis salutem. Mando et precipio vobis ne in terris Lanfranci archiepiscopi, que ad Hergam suum manerium pertinent, cervos vel cervas ne capreolas capiatitis nec omnino aliquam venationem in eis faciatis præter eos quibus ipse præcepit vel licentiam dederit."

I cannot but think that we have here an allusion to the prescriptive sporting rights of the Londoners confirmed to them by the last clause in the charter of Henry I.:—

"Et cives habeant fugationes suas ad fugandum sicut melius et plenius habuerunt antecessores eorum, sicut et Ciltre et Middlesex et Surole."

Lanfranc, it seems, had restricted these rights in the case of his extensive Harrow woodlands to certain individuals, and the Conqueror upheld the restriction. The clause in Henry's charter implies that the rights of the citizens had been impaired.

But the point to which I specially desire to call attention is that the form of address, in the Old English version of this writ, presents a most close parallel to that in the famous charter to London. In the latter King William greets "Gosfreð portirefan and ealle tha burhwaru binnan Lundene"; in the former he greets "Gosfreð scirgerefan and ealle tha burhwaru binnan Lundene." Not only does this correspondence afford mutual confirmation: the actual variance is no less valuable, for it tells us what seems to have been hitherto unknown (or at least overlooked), namely, that this "Gosfreð" was shire-reeve as well as portreeve, and that, as the Londoners' official head, he could be addressed by either style.

Now this affords just the evidence that was needed to prove conclusively the new theory I advanced in 'Geoffrey de Mandeville' (pp. 363-4), that the portreeve of London and sheriff of Middlesex were, under the Conqueror, one, and that the difficulty presented to Dr. Stubbs and others by "the disappearance of the portreeve" is solved by the fact that he did not disappear, but was simply the Norman vicecomes.

It is not yet actually proved that this "Gosfreð" was Geoffrey de Mandeville, though this further writ strengthens the evidence I referred to in the above work (p. 439) for that conclusion.

Lastly, I would ask what light the existence of this bilingual writ throws on what Dr. Liebermann has termed, in a communication to the Athenæum (September 2nd, 1893), "a bilingual ordinance of William I.," of which he finds traces in the thirteenth century 'Liber Pilosus' at St. Paul's. The Latin form given above seems to me a (more or less) contemporary version rather than a late translation, and, indeed, it is not, in any case, a mere translation, for the words "fidelibus suis" are added after "Londoniensibus." These words—normal in Latin writs of the period—are also found (but as "meis fidelibus") in the 'Liber Pilosus' transcript on which Dr. Liebermann relies. Will that eminent scholar, the greatest authority on the subject, tell us what he deems to be the true relation between the English and the Latin forms of the writ I have discussed?

J. H. ROUND.

MRS. BARRETT BROWNING'S PARENTAGE.

A DISCOVERY has been made by Mr. John Robinson, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, as to the parentage of Mrs. Barrett Browning. In the parish register of Kelloe, Durham, where Mrs. Browning's birth is recorded, the name of the mother is given as "Mary, late Clarke, native of Newcastle." Who this Mary Clarke was has until now been unknown, but Mr. Robinson has unearthed the marriage announcement in the Newcastle Chronicle of May 18th, 1806. The record reads:—"Married, on Tuesday last [May 14th], at Gosforth Church, by the Rev. Mr. Fenwick, Edward Barrett Moulton Barrett, Esq., to Miss Clarke, eldest daughter of John Graham Clarke, Esq., of this town." This John Graham Clarke was well known in Newcastle during the early part of the present century, and lived at Fenham Hall. The family have now no local connexion with the North, yet in St. Andrew's Churchyard, Newcastle, there is a large stone with the inscription: "The Burial place of John Graham Clarke." It is a singular coincidence that within a few feet of this vault is the tombstone of Charles Avison, on which is inscribed Robert Browning's tribute to the "Newcastle organist," from his 'Parleyings with certain People of Importance.' It was to the restoration fund of this tombstone that Browning, a few weeks before his death, contributed so handsomely, and wrote his last public letter. It may be that his knowledge of Mrs. Browning's association with Newcastle led to his praise of one—

On the list
Of worthies who by help of pipe or wire
Expressed in sound rough rage or soft desire,
Thou wiltown of Newcastle organist.

The personal association of Mrs. Barrett Browning with the north of England was of brief duration, yet there was, until a few years ago, an interesting memento of her association with Kelloe Church, where was written with a diamond on a square of glass, in one of the old windows, "Pretty Bessie Barrett." During the alterations of the church some years ago the window was removed, and the inscription was destroyed.

While the eldest daughter of Mr. Clarke, of Fenham Hall, married Mr. Barrett, the fourth daughter married Sir Thomas Butler, Bart., and his brother married another sister, third daughter. One of the daughters of this baronet married Capt. Sir R. A. Gosset, the late Sergeant-at-Arms to the House of Commons.

'THE DIARY OF A CAVALRY OFFICER.'

MR. TOMKINSON writes:—

"In your notice of 'The Diary of a Cavalry Officer,' which appears in your issue of Saturday, the 16th, a passage is quoted and commented on in which the writer speaks somewhat disparagingly of the part claimed by the late General Sir Hussey Vivian to have been played by him and his brigade at the battle of Waterloo.

"From the historical records of that battle, including such authorities as Siborne, Hooper, and the volume of 'Waterloo Letters,' I think it must appear that the author of the 'Diary' was mistaken both as to the point and time at which Vivian's brigade charged and came into contact with the enemy—after the repulse of the second column of Napoleon's Guard by Adam's Foot Brigade.

"It seems to be established that Vivian's brigade, comparatively fresh, and not having been previously engaged, were the first body of the Allies let loose to complete the defeat of the attacking party, and to advance against the enemy's position; and that they contributed largely to the general rout by charging and overthrowing their still remaining cavalry: while Vandeleur's brigade, advancing some fifteen or twenty minutes later, encountered only broken bodies of infantry, and at a greater distance from the Allied position.

"The differences of impression and description of the various phases of the same battle, and of the importance of services rendered in particular instances, are so notorious that an error of this kind might perhaps pass without correction, but that the passage in question has been taken in some quarters as a reflection on the services of Sir Hussey Vivian, which I desire by your permission, and through your columns, as far as possible to remove. In any future edition of the book a foot-note will be appended of a tenor similar to this letter."

SALH.

MESSRS. SOTHERY, WILKINSON & HODGE sold the following books from the library of Mr. Crawhall on the 23rd inst.: A Volume of Tracts and Pamphlets relating to the Infancy of Railways, 10s. 10s. Works of T. Bewick, being modern impressions from the original blocks, in 10 vols., 20s. Crawhall, Garlands for North-Country Anglers, large paper, Newcastle, 1864, 11s. Hodgson, History of Northumberland, 7 vols., with extra illustrations, 1827-58, 49s. A Collection of Book-plates (ex-libris) in 1 vol., including some by Bewick, 19s. Three volumes of Humorous Sketches by Mr. Crawhall that had been utilized by C. B. Keene for Punch, 26s. 10s. Bruce, Handbook to Newcastle-on-Tyne, with extra illustrations, 1863, 13s.

THE DYNOKES OF SCRIVELSBY.

SURELY Mr. Read and his "learned colleagues in genealogical research" might settle their case out of court instead of filling the valuable columns of the Athenæum by appeals to what "Burke says" in his 'Extinct Peerages,' or by supplying one another, as to Scrivelsby, with elementary information.

Dr. Eagar may write of Canon Lodge's "admirable monograph," and Mr. Read may speak of the Canon's letter as "most valuable"; but really Canon Lodge must not be offended if one respectfully declines to treat his book seriously. "Great pains have been taken," he assures us, "to ensure accuracy"; but to speak of "a document in the Cottonian Library entitled Claudius—dice todo. And why Canon Lodge, followed by Dr. Eagar, should persistently write of Scrivelsby as held by "knight serjeanty" (pp. 31, 34, 47, 174, 179, 180) it is difficult to say. A man held either by "knight-service" or by "serjeanty" (grand or petty). To speak of holding by "knight serjeanty" is like reckoning weight by "lba. troy avoirdupois."

It is also to be hoped that the "new edition of the Dymoke pedigree," to which Mr. Read looks forward, we learn, "with lively interest," will explain how, if Sir Thomas Dymoke was executed in 1470, "the eldest son of the murdered Champion was Lionel, who pre-deceased his father, and dying in 1519 [sic] was buried at Horncastle" (p. 56). It will also, no doubt, explain why the "Leonia Dymoke militis" of his interesting brass at Horncastle means "Lionel Dymoke a soldier" (p. 150), and not Sir Lionel (or Leo) Dymoke, Knight.

The history of the Championship really deserves treatment by competent hands, for in spite of its alleged origin at the Conquest, the first actual mention of its existence is, Canon Lodge is forced to admit, at the coronation of Richard II. (pp. 109, 177). I can, however, supply the missing earlier evidence for the tenure of Scirelawby by this peculiar "grand serjeanty," namely, a sworn verdict of February 26th, 1333-4, that its owner had "to find on the day of the coronation of the lord the king, who shall be at the time, a knight on horseback armed to prove by his body, if it shall be necessary," &c. This by no means proves that the tenure was coeval with the Conquest; but it has a most important bearing on the question at issue. J. H. ROUSE.

Literary Gossip.

THE Kelmescott edition of 'Atalanta in Calydon,' an especial feature of which will be a new title-page designed for the occasion by Mr. Morris, will be out almost immediately. Mr. Morris's translation of 'Beowulf,' in alliterative metres, is also nearly ready.

MR. EDMUND GOSSE is preparing for the press a new volume of poems. This will contain the verses he has written since the publication of 'Firdausi in Exile' eight years ago. The volume will include 'The Masque of Painters,' which was privately printed in 1885.

THE late Prof. Robertson Smith has left his letters and manuscripts to be dealt with by his brother, Mr. C. Michie Smith (Madras), and Dr. J. Sutherland Black. A new and considerably revised edition of his 'Religion of the Semites,' on which he had been engaged for some months before his death, is being prepared for the press by Dr. Black, and will be published by Messrs. A. & C. Black in the autumn.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK have practically completed arrangements for their new Bible Dictionary, to be published before the end of 1896. In conjunction with his friend and associate Dr. Sutherland Black, the late Prof. W. Robertson Smith had planned the work, and to a certain extent carried it out, when it was interrupted by his protracted and distressing illness. No later than last February he asked Prof. Cheyne to take over his share in the editorship, while himself still cherishing a hope (not destined to be realized) that he might be able to assist the editors. It is the desire of the joint editors to avail themselves as much as possible of the material (both published and unpublished) left at their disposal by Prof. Robertson Smith; and among other scholars and specialists who have promised their help may be named Profs. Driver, Sanday, and Margoliouth (Oxford), Robinson, Ryle, Middleton, Ridgeway, and Bevan (Cambridge), A. B. Davidson (Edinburgh), A. B. Bruce and G. A. Smith (Glasgow), A. R. S. Kennedy (Aberdeen), Bennett (Hackney College), Whitehouse (Cheshunt), Tiele (Leyden), Nöldeke, Budde, and Spitta (Strasbourg), Wellhausen (Göttingen), Jülicher (Marburg), Socin and Guthe (Leipzig), Stade (Giessen), Schmiedel (Zurich), Schurer (Kiel), Moore (Andover), Francis Brown (New York), Haupt (Johns Hopkins University), and Toy (Harvard), the Rev. Dr. Abbott (late Head Master of the City of London School), Dr. Wallis Budge, of the British Museum, Dr. Benzinger (Tübingen), Dr. W. T. Thiselton Dyer, of Kew, Mr. L. W. King, of the British Museum, Dr. C. Creighton, Messrs. James, Shipley, Burkett, and McLean (Cambridge), Messrs. Charles and Gray (Oxford), and Mr. Addis (Nottingham).

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish immediately a small volume on 'The Unemployed' by Mr. Geoffrey Drage, the well-known Secretary to the Labour Commission. After a general introduction, Mr. Drage deals with what has hitherto been done to solve the problem of the unemployed, with the nature and causes of the present distress, and with what may be done in the future.

MAJOR GRIFFITHS, who has long been a contributor to the World, has been appointed its editor in succession to the late Edmund Yates.

MR. HALL CAINE has joined the Board of Directors of the Authors' Club.

MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS has been recommended by Lord Rosebery for 50*l.* a year on the Civil List.

THE new stained-glass Caxton window at the north end of the Hall of the Company of Stationers, on Ludgate Hill, will be unveiled by the Lord Mayor on Thursday next.

WE regret to announce the death from brain fever of Mr. John Underhill, who for the past nine years had been connected with the staff of the Pall Mall Gazette, from which paper he retired quite lately in order to devote himself to letters. He had already edited Spence's 'Anecdotes' and the 'Athenian Oracle,' which is full of most valuable information concerning the middle-class life of the last century. His last published work was an edition of Gay's 'Poems' in the "Muses' Library." An essay on the works of Mr. Besant is in the hands of the printer. Mr. Underhill was also engaged on editions of Jeremy Collier and of the plays of Gay, upon a history of English journalism, and on an elaborate estimate of the work of Sir Frederic Leighton. He died at the age of twenty-nine years.

THE Law Quarterly Review for July will contain articles on 'Lord Bowen,' by Lord Justice Davey; 'Sir James Stephen as a Legislator,' by Mr. C. P. Ilbert, C.S.I.; 'The Nature and Meaning of Law,' by Sir Frederick Pollock; and 'After-Acquired Property in Bankruptcy,' by Mr. E. Cooper Willis, Q.C.

IT is proposed to erect in the parish church of Prestbury, Cheshire, where he resided, a memorial in honour of the late Mr. James Croston, F.S.A.

ONE of the oldest of provincial journalists has just passed away in the person of Mr. Robert Ackrill, the proprietor of the Harrogate Herald, which first appeared in 1847. His journalistic life dates back much longer than the publication of the Herald. He was seventy-eight years of age.

MISS JENNETT HUMPHREYS is bringing out a small collection of 'Old Welsh Nursery Rhymes,' translated into English for the first time. They are being got ready at Carnarvon, to be in time for the Eisteddfod next month.

MR. C. R. RIVINGTON writes:—

"As some time since inquiry was made respecting the father of the late Master of Balliol College, it may be interesting to record that in May, 1825, Mr. Jowett, with his partners Samuel Mills and Samuel Mills, jun., took a lease of the premises in Bell Court which until recently have been used as the Stationers' School. Mr. Jowett was then residing at Lewisham, and is described in the lease as 'Benjamin Jowett the younger.' Although the lease was for twenty-eight years from June, 1825, Mr. Jowett's name does not appear in connexion with the firm for many years, and the business was afterwards removed to Crane Court, Fleet Street."

M. W. MUSE-ARNOET has compiled an Assyrian-English-German glossary. It is not the author's plan to embrace the whole cuneiform literature thus far published nor to compile a concordance of the texts represented in the glossary. His chief aim has been to register all the important words occurring in the texts, historical and others, that are read by all beginners. In addition to these some texts, read and used by most Semitic scholars, have been completely indexed, viz., Delitzsch's 'Assyrische Lesestücke' (cited in the glossary as D), Haupt's 'Akkadisch-Sumerische Keilschrifttexte' (= H), and Haupt's 'Nimrod Epos,' tablet VI. (= NE). To enhance the value of the glossary and at the same time to reduce its bulk, the author has inserted a complete index to Delitzsch's 'Assyrian Grammar.' He has not classified the words according to their stems, but has adopted a purely alphabetical order. In the arrangement of his material he has endeavoured to be both as practical and as scientific as possible. In most cases all derivatives are mentioned under their respective stems; but in order to facilitate the finding of words, especially of derivatives from feeble stems, all words will be cited also in alphabetical order, with appended reference to their stems.

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON will shortly publish in one volume the complete poems of Miss Constance Naden.

'BRITISH FAMILY NAMES: THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING,' by Dr. Henry Barber, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. The work will contain some 8,000 family names, which will be comprised in separate lists of Scandinavian, Frisian, Anglo-Saxon, and Norman origin.

DR. JOHN T. GILBERT, the well-known historian, has been appointed a member of the Senate of the Royal University of Ireland, in the room of the late Lord Emly.

ALREADY some applications have been received for accommodation at the Seaside Home for Booksellers, No. 49, Royal Parade, Eastbourne; and it is hoped the house will be opened early in next week. Mr. R. B. Marston has kindly promised to send a case of books, to be the nucleus of the library, and to present Scribner's Magazine, the Fishing Gazette, and the Publishers' Circular. The home will, we believe, be opened to assistants, whether the firms by which they are employed have subscribed to the fund for establishing the institution or not. Applications for admission should be made to Mr. Lerner, who has been appointed secretary.

THE second Prix Gobert, of the value of 1,000 fr., has been granted to Prof. Marchand for his 'Le Maréchal François de Scépeaux de Vieilleville et ses Mémoires,' a most remarkable work, in which the Professor has brought the light of criticism to bear upon an unscrupulously written volume of memoirs. This news will please the numerous friends the Professor made while in this country.

GERMAN papers report that the Japanese professor Mori, who studied in Germany, has translated Goethe's 'Werther's Leiden' into his native language, and that "Young Japan" is crying over the sufferings of the unfortunate lover.

IN our next number we intend to publish a series of articles on the literature of the Continent during the past twelve months. In these Belgium will be treated of by Prof. Fredericq; Bohemia by M. V. Tille; Denmark by Dr. A. Ipsen; France by M. Joseph Reinach; Germany by Hofrath Zimmermann; Greece by Prof. Lambros; Holland by M. Taco de Beer; Hungary by M. L. Katscher; Italy by Commendatore Bonghi; Poland by Dr. Belcikowski; Russia by M. Milyoukov; and Spain by Don Juan F. Riaño.

THE Parliamentary Papers this week include Fifth and Final Report of the Labour Commission (5s. 9d.); Annual Statement of the Trade of the United Kingdom (3s. 10d.); Court of Criminal Appeal, Report of Judges (2d.); Statutes made by the Governing Body of Christ Church, Oxford, January 24th (1d.); Savings Bank and Friendly Societies, Accounts (1d.); and a Report of the Proceedings of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, under the Endowed Schools Acts, for the year 1893 (1d.).

SCIENCE

Essays in Historical Chemistry. By T. E. Thorpe, Ph.D., F.R.S. (Macmillan & Co.) This book gives in thirteen chapters biographical essays on some of the greatest masters of the science of chemistry from the time of the founding of the Royal Society of London down to the present date. Most of the essays, if not all, have been already in print in various Transactions and Proceedings, or amongst the Manchester science lectures, or in reviews; but the author has altered and corrected them, and arranged them in historical sequence. There is no pretence that this constitutes a history of chemistry: many eminent chemists, such as Black, Berzelius, Dalton, Davy, Liebig, and Hofmann, do not come in for full notice. After perusing the present volume, we are sure that every reader will hope that Dr. Thorpe will find time to continue his researches into the biographies of other master chemists, and will from time to time give his results to the public.

The first essay is on "The Father of Chemistry, and Brother of the Earl of Cork"—"The Sceptical Chymist," Robert Boyle. He was a man of great caution; indeed, Humboldt called him "the cautious and doubting Robert Boyle"; but his splendid researches on the elastic power or spring of air will cause him to be always remembered, although the law he propounded is too often ascribed to Mariotte. Boyle made many experiments on respiration, which would be difficult to carry out in this country to-day, using cats, mice, sparrows, fishes, tadpoles, and snails as reagents; but he was a very tender-hearted man, and used, after an experiment, to console a frightened mouse with a warm before the fire and a piece of cheese.

Sketches of the lives of the two discoverers of oxygen, Joseph Priestley and Wilhelm Scheele, follow. These men were very different in some of their characteristics—both, however, did splendid work for chemistry, mainly as experimenters. Priestley's defence of the doctrine of phlogiston, after his own researches had dealt the death-blow to it, is curious, and well illustrates a remark of his own quoted by Dr. Thorpe on p. 52:

"We may take a maxim so strongly for granted, that the plainest evidence of sense will not entirely change, and often hardly modify, our persuasions; and the more ingenious a man is, the more effectually he is entangled in his errors, and (sic) his ingenuity only helping him to deceive himself by evading the force of truth." Scheele's life was all too short and rendered hard by poverty, but he served chemistry with a loyal and noble devotion, and was one of the greatest discoverers of his age.

Henry Cavendish is next noticed. To him is due the merit of first clearly perceiving that chemistry as a science rests on quantitative relations:—

"He fixed the weight of the earth; he established the proportions of the constituents of the air; he occupied himself with the quantitative study of the laws of heat; and, lastly, he demonstrated the nature of water, and determined its volumetric composition. Earth, air, fire, and water—each and all came within the range of his observation."

As a man he was singularly devoid of passions and emotions, and a recluse. The brilliant Lavoisier, who, with twenty-eight other *fermiers-général*s, suffered on the scaffold on May 9th, 1794, receives a good notice; and there is reprinted the presidential address to the Chemical Section of the British Association in 1890 'On Priestley, Cavendish, Lavoisier, and La Révolution Chimique,' in which, we trust, is finally settled the dispute as to the discovery of oxygen; as it has been well put, Priestley discovered dephlogisticated air, Lavoisier gave oxygen to science. Notices of Faraday, of Thomas Graham, Friedrich Wöhler, Jean Baptiste André Dumas, Hermann Kopp, and Dmitri Ivanowitch Mendeléeff follow; and a final chapter on the "Rise and Development of Synthetical Chemistry." Not only does Dr. Thorpe enter fully into the varying aspects of the scientific spirit of each of the great men he writes about, but he delights also to prove, when material exists for it, that they were human and had human sympathies. Dumas, who was well qualified to judge, shows that scientific men are not without their rewards in this world, even when riches do not follow their labours. He wrote:—

"My life has been divided between the service of science and that of my country. I would rather have remained the servant of science alone; but sprung from the obscure ranks of democracy, I have always thought that my country had done so much for me that no devotion on my part could be refused to it. If I have deceived myself science itself will not hold me guilty. In limiting myself to scientific pursuits, I should have been happier, my life would have been a less anxious one, and perhaps I should have attained a larger view of truth."

Again:—

"Allow me to add that the recollections of an already long life have permitted me to become acquainted with a great variety of personages. And if I call on memory to picture to me how the type of true happiness is realized on earth, I do not see it under the form of the powerful man clothed in high authority, nor under that of the rich man to whom the splendours of luxury and the delicacies of well-being are granted, but under that of the man of science, who consecrates his life to penetrating the secrets of nature and to the discovery of new truths."

The author has in this collection of essays told something of the work and the lives of some men of science, and has done this in a pleasing and sympathetic manner; for this his readers will cordially thank him. No follower of the science of chemistry can well be without this little volume, and a large number of others who may have little knowledge of chemistry will peruse it with great pleasure and no little profit. Again, it is to be hoped that the work of the official post to which Dr. Thorpe is appointed may leave him sufficient leisure to continue his literary work, which to him is evidently a labour of love, so that in time we may have from his pen a fairly complete history of chemistry in the history of celebrated chemists.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—June 21.—Lord Kelvin, President, in the chair.—Dr. J. R. Bradford and Prof. M. J. M. Hill were admitted into the Society.—The following papers were read: 'Researches on Explosives,' Preliminary Note, by Sir A. Noble;—'Measurement of Colour produced by Contrast,' by Capt. Abney;—'Degenerations consequent on Experimental Lesions of the Cerebellum,' by Dr. R. Russell;—'A Contribution to the Study of (1) some of the Decussating Tracts of the Mid- and Inter-brain, and (2) of the Pyramidal System in the Mesencephalon and Bulb,' by Mr. R. Boyce;—'The Rotation of the Electric Arc,' by Mr. A. P. Trotter;—'Researches on the Structure, Organization, and Classification of the Fossil Reptilia,' Part IX., Sections 4-6, by Prof. Seeley;—'On the Viscosity of Water as determined by Mr. J. B. Hannay, by means of his Micro-rheometer,' by Mr. R. E. Barnett;—'On the Absorption Spectra of Dilute Solutions,' by Dr. T. Ewan;—'On some Phenomena in Vacuum-tubes,' by Sir D. Salomons;—'*On the Structure and Affinities of Helipora cerulea (Fall), with some Observations on the Structure of Xenia and *Heteroxenia,' by Mr. G. C. Bourne;—'On the Differential Invariants of Twisted Curves, with some Illustrations of the Application to Quartic Curves,' by Mr. R. F. Gwyther;—'On the Singular Solutions of Simultaneous Ordinary Differential Equations and the Theory of Congruencies,' by Prof. A. C. Dixon;—'On the Different Forms of Breathing,' by Dr. Marcat;—'On the Photographic Spectrum of the Great Nebula in Orion,' and 'On Spectrum Changes in β Lyra,' Preliminary Note, by Prof. Lockyer;—'On the Evolution of the Vertebral Column of Fishes,' by Dr. H. Gadow and Miss Abbott;—'The Electric Strength of Mixtures of Nitrogen and Hydrogen,' by Miss Fawcett;—'A Magnetic Survey of the British Isles for the Epoch January 1st, 1891," by Prof. Rucker and Thorpe; — 'The Asymmetrical Probability Curve,' by Prof. F. Y. Edgeworth; — 'On the Difference of Potential that may be established at the Surface of the Ground immediately above and at Various Distances from a Buried Mass of Metal charged from a High-Pressure Electric Light Supply,' by Major P. Cardew and Major Bagnold; — and 'On an Instrument for indicating and measuring Difference of Phase between E.M.F. and Current in any Alternating Current System,' by Major P. Cardew.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—June 25.—Mr. C. R. Markham, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Major O. S. Baynes, Capt. E. St. C. Pemberton, Messrs. P. Bigelow, E. H. Chamberlain, A. H. Collier, A. G. Haydon, F. Porter, H. Price, and J. G. Shaw.—The papers read were 'Kafiristan,' by Mr. G. S. Robertson; and 'The Harnsworth-Jackson North Polar Expedition,' by Mr. F. G. Jackson.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—June 21.—Sir A. W. Franks, President, in the chair.—The Rev. R. H. Lathbury exhibited a curious and hitherto unnoticed palm-leaf tablet from Denham, Bucks, having on the reverse the effigy of a Franciscan friar.—Dr. E. Maunde Thompson read a paper on a Latin deed of sale of a slave, dated May 24th, A.D. 166, from a papyrus in the British Museum, found in the Fayyum.—Mr. Oldfield read a paper, illustrated by diagrams, on his restoration of the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus, the main principles of which, with the evidence, literary and monumental, by which it was supported, had been explained in his two previous papers of June 15th and 22nd, 1893. He stated that on the joint indications of the lacunaria and the lions' heads of the cymatium, he agreed with Prof. Cockerell in making the columniations of the peristyle only 8 ft. 9 in., or two and a half diameters, corresponding with the "pseudostyle" system of Vitruvius, which was adopted owing to the exceptional weight of the pyramidal roof. He described the principal vertical divisions of the building, as shown in his diagrams. Externally, the basement constituted the pyramis inferior of Pliny, which was, like the upper pyramid, 14 ft. 6 in. in height, and graduated in steps. Internally, it contained the true cella of the monument, the chamber discovered and destroyed by the Knights of Rhodes in 1522, and restored in Mr. Oldfield's diagram from the description of De la Tourrette. The pteron, or principal story, had, as he held, no enclosed compartment, but consisted merely of eight massive but isolated piers, surrounded first by a quadrangular cincture of detached square pilasters, and outside these by the thirty-six columns of Pliny's description. At its centre, visible from without on all four sides, stood the colossal bronze akros of Mausolus. From the north and south sides of the pteron were projected octostyle colonnades, from its east and west fronts pediment-headed hexastyle porticoes, with columns on their returns, making eight to each portico; and these columns, with four more at the intervening corners of the pteron, made up the required thirty-six. The 63 ft. which Pliny gives as the length of the north and south sides was really the measure of the two lateral colonnades. The 411 ft. given as the totus circuitus was in the present restoration the exact perimeter of the whole pteron, measured on its lowest step. Above the pteron Mr. Oldfield, following Canina and Cockerell, inserted an attic. He described the form and dimensions of the upper pyramid, and showed by diagrams how its original apex was enclosed by Pnyth within the pedestal he constructed for his quadriga. Passing to the interior, he showed the probable position of the cella, and of the sepulchral chamber also discovered by the knights. Both the cella and the interior of the pteron above were, as he suggested, roofed with hollow pyramids, formed of approaching horizontal stones, similarly to certain tombs at Fanticapum and at Camirus, which he described. How the sculptures of the Mausoleum were adapted to the design, Mr. Oldfield hopes to show in a future paper.—Observations followed from Mr. Murray, of the British Museum, Mr. Phené Spiers, and the President. They were unanimously favourable to Mr. Oldfield's restoration as compared with Mr. Pullan's and Mr. Ferguson's, of both of which diagrams were then exhibited. No objection was taken to Mr. Oldfield's interpretation of Pliny, nor to any of his archaeological arguments; but modifications were suggested of certain details in his elevation, with a view to architectural effect.

STATISTICAL.—June 26.—Annual General Meeting.—Mr. C. Booth, President, in the chair.—The report of the Council was unanimously adopted, and the following were elected to serve as President, Council, and officers for the ensuing session: President, Right Hon. Lord Farrer; Council, A. H.

Bailey, A. E. Bateman, H. R. Beeton, J. Bonar, S. Bourne, Sir C. Boyle, J. O. Chadwick, Hyde Clarke, Major P. G. Craigie, F. C. Danvers, F. B. Garnett, J. Glover, Viscount Grimston, Lord George F. Hamilton, R. Hamilton, F. Hendriks, Noel A. Humphreys, C. S. Loch, G. B. Longstaff, J. B. Martin, R. B. Martin, A. Milner, F. G. P. Neison, W. Ogle, Right Hon. the Earl of Onslow, T. J. Pittar, Sir W. C. Plowden, R. Price-Williams, J. Rae, and R. A. Yerburgh; Treasurer, R. B. Martin; Honorary Secretaries, J. B. Martin, A. E. Bateman, and Major P. G. Craigie; Foreign Honorary Secretary, J. B. Martin.—A Silver Guy Medal was presented to Mr. A. Sauerbeck for his paper, read in April, 1893, 'On Prices of Commodities during the last Seven Years,' and in recognition of the valuable series of articles which Mr. Sauerbeck has from time to time contributed to the Society's Journal.

LINNEAN.—June 21.—Mr. C. R. Clarke, President, in the chair.—Messrs. P. W. Hildyard and H. A. Cummins were admitted and Mr. W. Gardner was elected a Fellow.—Mr. G. Brebner exhibited and made remarks upon specimens of Scaphopora speciosa, Kjellm., a seaweed new to Britain, describing with the aid of lantern slides the structure and mode of fructification in this and other allied algae.—Mr. J. R. Jackson exhibited the cone of a stone pine, Pinus pinea, Linn., which had been picked up by the Comte de Paris in the Coto del Rey, Seville, and had sprouted and continued to grow for a month afterwards. This peculiarity, which had been often noticed in the larch, was said to be of rare occurrence in the pine.—Mr. T. Christy exhibited and made remarks upon a small-berried coffee plant from Iohannabane, East Africa, somewhat similar to a variety from Sierra Leone and other parts of the west coast. It was said to be valued for its fine aromatic bitter taste, which made it useful for flavouring beans and other material ground up and sold as coffee.—Mr. A. B. Benda gave an abstract of a paper upon a collection of plants from East Equatorial Africa brought home by Dr. J. W. Gregory and the Rev. W. Taylor, amongst which were several new species.—A paper followed by the President 'On Tabulation Areas,' in which the views of Dr. A. R. Wallace and others on geographical distribution were discussed, and the best mode of tabulating results considered.—After some discussion, the meeting adjourned to November 1st.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—June 27.—Annual Meeting.—Sir H. Doulton, V.P., in the chair.—The principal business of the meeting was the reading of the annual report, and the election of the new Council for the year 1894-5.—The Prince of Wales was re-elected President, which office he has filled since 1864. The new Vice-Presidents elected were H.R.H. the Duke of York, the Earl of Rosebery, Lord Halsbury, and Sir C. Boyle; the new Members of Council were Capt. Abney, Mr. W. Barry, Lord Belhaven, and Mr. A. Siemens.—The report, which was read by the Secretary, Sir Henry Wood, summarized the work of the Society for the past year, and referred specially to the Chicago Exhibition, for which the Council of the Society had acted as a Royal Commission.

HISTORICAL.—June 21.—Mr. H. E. Malden in the chair.—Messrs. J. R. Temple and W. G. Johnson were elected Fellows.—A paper was read 'On the Causes of the Renewal of the War between England and France in 1803,' by Mr. W. Ekedahl. Sir J. Ramsay, Mr. P. Bigelow, and Mr. D. Lloyd took part in the discussion.—Dr. F. Liebermann, of Berlin, a Corresponding Fellow of the Society, communicated a text of the Coronation Charter of Henry I. It was announced that this text, which is derived from a collation of twenty-eight important MSS., will be printed in the next volume of the Society's Transactions, with an English introduction by Dr. Liebermann.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.
Mon. Royal Institution, 8.—General Monthly Meeting.
Wed. Archaeological Institute, 4.—Tomb of St. Hugh at Lincoln, Mr. F. J. Willson; 'Invasions of Nubia,' Mr. S. Clarke; 'Romæ Antiquities in Christide,' Prof. H. Leuba.

Science Gossip.

A VOLUME containing a memoir of the late Mr. G. J. Romanes, F.R.S., is to be published. Those who possess letters of general interest written by him are requested to forward them to Mrs. Romanes, 94, St. Aldate's, Oxford. The letters will be returned so soon as their contents have been noted and copies made.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co. have nearly ready for publication a series of 'Object Lessons in Elementary Science,' prepared in accordance with the scheme issued by the London School Board. The author, Mr. Vincent Murché, who is Head Master of the Boundary Lane Board School, Camberwell, has already used the lessons with success in his own teaching, and Mr. Acland, the Vice-President of the Council, expressed his approval of the method on a recent visit to the school.

THE seal is generally supposed to be extinct, or at most a very rare visitor, on the coasts of Southern Africa, and in Berghaus's 'Physical Atlas' their northern limit passes far to the south of the Cape of Good Hope. During a recent journey, however, along the coast to the north of Walfish Bay, Major C. von François discovered "several thousand" seals at Cape Cross. It appears, therefore, that the seals have returned since the whalers have retired from this coast as unprofitable. Major von François's report is published in the Mittheilungen aus Deutschen Schutzgebieten, an official publication abounding in geographical and scientific information about the German protectorates.

THE sun will be in apogee on the morning of the 3rd prox. Mercury will be in inferior conjunction with the sun on the evening of the 20th. Venus is a morning star, and will move during July from Taurus into Gemini, coming into very close conjunction with μ Geminorum (a third-magnitude star) on the 28th. Mars is in Pisces, and rises a little before midnight; he will be in conjunction with the moon (the day before she enters her last quarter) on the 24th, and in perihelion on the 26th. Jupiter is in Taurus, and will be in conjunction with Venus on the morning of the 20th. Saturn is still in Virgo; he sets now about midnight, and will do so soon after 10 o'clock in the evening at the end of next month.

PROF. BARNARD has been making a series of micrometric measurements of three out of the four earliest-discovered small planets, and finds (contrary to what had been previously supposed) that Ceres is the largest of them all, and is probably not much less than six hundred miles in diameter. This, it will be remembered, was Piazzi's discovery on the first day of the present century. Vesta, which has been often supposed from its light to be the largest of the four, Prof. Barnard's determination makes little more than two hundred miles in diameter, and that of Pallas somewhat less than three.

FINE ARTS

THE SALONS. (Sixth Notice.)

AFTER the portraits the branch of art the most practised at the present day is landscape. The time is long passed away when aesthetic critics used to condemn it as an inferior pursuit, when "the portrait of insignificant and inanimate nature" was excluded from "high art." To say the truth, this attitude of disdain is still somewhat willingly assumed by the "painters of history," and, in spite of the classicality of his style, the election of M. François at the Académie des Beaux-Arts has not passed without some protests on the part of the orthodox of the old school. Among the Romantics even, in the heroic age of the Théodore Rousseaus and Jules Duprés, Baudelaire expressed his surprise that "un marécage miroitant, fourmillant d'herbes humides et marqueté de plaques lumineuses, un tronc d'arbre rogneux, une chaumière à la toiture fleurie, un petit bout de nature enfin," could pass for a sufficient subject for a picture, and he reproached Théodore Rousseau for "falling into the notorious modern mistake which arises from a blind love of nature and nothing but nature"; and he saw "in the triumph and the predominance of an inferior class of work, in this silly worship of nature not refined, not explained by the imagination, an evident sign of the general degradation." It would have been easy to reply that in a little corner of nature the whole idea and the mystery and the grand harmony of creation can be combined and contained; that every landscape represents, along with a fragment of nature, the emotion and the confidence of the heart of the man who has beheld it and put into it a moment of his life, a little of his love; that, to use the words of Victor Hugo,

Dien nous prête un moment les pieds et les fontaines,
Les grands bois frissonnants, les rocs profonds et sourds,
Et les cieux azurés et les bords des plaines,
Pour y mettre nos cœurs, nos rêves, nos amours.

But to feel these things there were needed a simplicity of heart and a moral health which were not in the possession of the exhausted, morbid, and evil poet the study of whom has led astray in our own day so many young people.

In despite of the disdain of the classical and decadent schools, landscape will none the less be the great fact in the history of painting in the nineteenth century. It is to its progress that all the renovations of the modern palette and of picturesque language correspond; it has penetrated all the departments of art, and has taken possession of them. History itself, which used to look down upon it, has been invaded; it is to its landscape that the two most striking tableaux d'histoire in the Champs Elysées, the Judas of M. Foreau (No. 744) and the Défilé de la Hache, by M. Paul Buffet (320), owe the best of their expressiveness and of their poetry.

It is impossible here to enter into details about the five or six hundred landscapes exhibited at the two Salons. They may be divided into two principal groups: on the one hand those which owe much to the masters of the school of 1830, who, in their turn, owed much to Constable and the Dutchmen; the other of those who work on impressionist methods, and derive—all differences of time, environment, and genius being put on one side—from the last manner of Turner. At the moment, by the way, I am writing this a beautiful exhibition of the English school is open at the Sedelmeyer Gallery, and a subscription has been started to present to the Louvre the 'Ancient Italy' of Turner. But to return to the two schools: the former think that trees and rocks have a life and physiognomy of their own, their individual forms. They like to place them pretty close to their motif, in order that the detail of the powerful branches may remain perceptible to them, and they do not admit that the light and atmosphere should swallow up and absorb the natural and artificial clearness of the design. The others are above everything sensible to the life of the atmosphere, to the palpitation of the ether. The world appears to them as in a glorious dream, an hallucination of rays and of reflections. Of these they essay, with a lyricism occasionally incoherent, to fix in their passage the fugitive and constantly changeable appearances. Between the two schools—the former is certainly by far the more numerously represented—some young men, drawing more or less directly from Cazin, seek in the hours of twilight or of night, and in the veiled transparencies and the melancholy of attenuated daylight, a more intimate, more discreet, and more tender poetry. To mention names and examples would involve me in over-lengthy discussion of this tendency.

The scenes and the life of the fields and home life have also numerous interpreters. To what purpose, in fact, need we go and seek so far and turn over books to find subjects for pictures? There happen daily around us marvellous things, and the world is full of unpublished beauties. The rôle of the painter is to show us them, to render them perceptible to the too little educated eyes of men, to condense in one fragment of rectangular canvas their essential characters, their harmonies, and their sentiment. He has no need, in order to succeed in this, to grow pale over æsthetic treatises, and to learn by heart the definitions of the Agreeable, the Beautiful, and the Sublime. It will suffice him, if he knows thoroughly his profession, to look at nature and life and listen to his heart. When he had learnt from old Jacob Swanenburgh "the first elements and the principles," and had heard much talk of Italy from his other master, Pieter Lastman, young Rembrandt, who had preserved in his heart the longing for his dear Leyden, resolved to resist the fashion of the Romanizers, and to establish himself in his native land. One of his pupils, Samuel van Hoogstraten, who loved to ask him questions and note his sayings, picked up this one: "In your own country itself you will find so many beauties that your life will be too short to understand them and express them. Italy itself, however rich she may be, will be useless to you if you are not capable of rendering the nature that surrounds you. Style consists in choosing, in co-ordinating in a work, the things which are the most in harmony with one another." These words ought to be inscribed in letters of gold on the walls of all studios.

Of the pictures of private life which have the most deservedly attracted attention, the Benedicite (1198) of Mr. John Lorimer, at the Champs Elysées, deserves special mention. The Ministry of the Fine Arts has acquired it for the Luxembourg, and it is certainly a good acquisition. I suppose before being shown in Paris this picture figured in some London exhibition, and that your readers have not forgotten this dining-room lighted by candles shaded by yellow shades, opening by a large bay on a silken twilight sky of an infinite softness, and between these two notes, yellow and blue, in a harmonious demi-tint, the row of little children seated at table round their grandmother, the charm of truth in the heads bent during the grace, the charm of invention in all the details—flowers, china, fruit, which all join in an intimate and soothing symphony.

The Ouvriers de la Terre (990) and the Nourrice (989) of M. Roll, the Patins de Neige (1072) of M. Skredsvig, the Foire (1198) of M. Zorn, the Brasserie de Campagne (734) of M. Liebermann, and the Repas frugal (476) of M. Friant, at the Champ de Mars; the Orphelins (1411) of Mr. William Mainwaring Palin, the Jeune Veuve (68) of Mr. John H. Bacon, and the Porcelain and Ancres (743), by Mr. Stanhope Forbes, at the Champs Elysées, are, in their different ways and sentiments, deserving also of remark. Never will it sufficiently be repeated that the most humble spectacles can inspire masterpieces. It seems to me that a popular education in the fine arts would be given, especially to our democracy, by attempting a sort of explanation of the masterpieces. It would be needful to make plain the relations of art and of life, to show how the highest inspirations of the greatest artists have sprung from a movement of the heart, a human emotion, quite parallel—in nature, if not in degree—to those which good people experience daily. And who knows, who can foresee, the results of a teaching of this sort, where men would learn to read at once the book of art, of nature, and of their own hearts? ANDRÉ MICHEL.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY. (Fifth Nation.—Landscapes.)

We may conclude our notice of the oil pictures in this exhibition by disposing of the landscapes we have not yet mentioned, and with this in view we may begin with some works that we can praise more or less heartily. For instance, Mr. F. Milner was fortunate in the choice of such a subject as Lolant sands at Low Tide (87). Broad, pure in colour and illumination, and most massively composed, it is quite as natural as the Hangman Hill (65) of Mr. W. J. Shaw, and much simpler; still, Mr. Shaw may be congratulated upon a good composition, grey tones, and good wave drawing.—Another broad and simple picture, showing art and good taste applied to an ordinary piece of natural scenery, is Mr. W. R. Wood's A Recollection (75), the title of which infers that it was not painted out of doors. If not direct from nature, it is full of sympathy with her.—Another good work, very differently treated from any of the above, yet equally authentic, Mr. F. Whitehead's Purbeck Hills, from the Frome (94), is broad, unpretentious, and natural.—Mr. MacWhirter sends, as his diploma work, a picture of Nature's Archway (124), an effective, if not particularly subtle rendering of an evening effect in a wooded valley. We heartily trust posterity may not judge the present generation of Academicians by their contributions to the Diploma Gallery. (Otherwise the R.A.s of our time will seem unworthy of their forerunners, and British art will appear to have been in our day in a very bad way. We say British art advisedly, because the Academy of this time does not comprise more than two Irishmen, and one of these in, we believe, of English descent. Here is another of the wrongs of Ireland, another illustration of the baseness of the Saxon.)

No living painter has improved more of late than Mr. H. Woods, who, since Mr. Logedail betook himself to Venetian scenes, seems to have profited by that unacclaimed artist's example, if not by his teaching. It is true that Mr. Woods's Waiting for a Ferry (130), although bright, is a little painty and crude in its touches, tones, and tints. Still, the figures are neat and firm, and the buildings are much better than in his previous works. The Colleoni Statue, Venice (256), is a yet more successful effort, marking greater improvement in composition as well as in handling and lighting. Very crisp and dexterous indeed, it approaches a Passini in brilliance of touch and colour, and fairly seems to sparkle. Photography may have had nothing to do with this capital work, but there is no reason why it should not. On the other hand, Una "Campagnada" (752) is even more painty than No. 130, and not nearly so good as No. 250.—These pictures deserve to be studied along with Mr. Logedail's capital Venetian pieces in the New Gallery, and his works at the Academy, to which we now come. No. 151, Feeding the Pigeons in Piazza San Marco, Venice, is an example of rare firmness and brush power employed in the representation of architecture in sunlight, modelled with extreme simplicity in a manner which reminds us of Canaletto and Guardi, although the golden lights and glowing shadows of the latter and the exquisite finesse of his touch are not to be found in the purple shades and yellow and grey lights of Mr. Logedail. Fondamenta dell' Abbazia, Venice (729), the solid picture of a water gate, is nearly as praiseworthy.

Turning to some landscapes and seascapes, most of them of English scenes, we may begin with Mr. W. Dickson's "Wide, wild, and open to the sea" (157), a marsh in showery weather, distinct in bluish daylight, and simply and tenderly painted; and a less excellent and artistic picture, very like an elaborate piece of Tunbridge ware, Mr. B. W. Leader's picture called A Wet Roadside (164), which is highly popular because it is facile, shallow in sentiment, and bright in its colours. Mr. Leader's Surrey Woodland (317) is another instance of sentiment of a trivial sort, hard, bright, like a wood-mosaic in colours, and only superficially (and therefore unsympathetically) like nature. Worcester Cathedral (371) illustrates the best side of such artificial art as Mr. Leader's, and in its bright way is quite a pretty piece of furniture, being well composed withal. The most fortunate of his artistic gifts is an unusually happy knack of composing the elements of his pictures. In this respect he altogether surpasses the late Mr. Vicat Cole, of whom it was not quite unfairly said that he had but two schemes of composition, or rather one, which, like a glove, could be turned inside out. Mr. Leader's resources are greater than this, and he has at least two ideas about the pathetic expressiveness in landscape.—Mr. B. Hook's In the Rhone Valley (171), a sunlit Alpine road in a stupendous pass, is rather heavily touched; still it is very solid, fresh, and original. A better and stronger picture is Stapton Sands (844), a glowing scene, pure in light and broad in its effect. The best, however, of this artist's works of the year is, we think, Start Bay (861), where the colour is really fine, and the air expansive and true.—A tall barque, with all her sails set, travelling swiftly before the wind, is expressively painted in Mr. W. E. Norton's Mid-Channel (180), but the sea and the clouds seem spotty and flat. The same artist's A Calm Night (598) deserves attention, for it is expressive and fresh.—Mr. P. Graham's Head of the Loch (183) is decidedly expressive, but it is in no respect fresh. A telling picture, it represents clouds, mists, a furious green sea breaking on black rocks covered with mussels, a flying gleam of light, and almost all the old materials of the painter's well-used repertory. The choice of hackneyed studies would be the less regrettable if only the manner of dealing with them were new, but the fact is, the name of this picture is the one fresh thing about it.—Sunset at Sea (203) is by Mr. E. Hayes, who is partial to similar effects, and has painted them often; in this instance his sea-painting is better than usual, and the pearly-tinted sky is the best he has executed, so far as we know.—On the other hand, it is impossible to say anything of this sort about Mr. Colin Hunter. His seas are like so many acres, or banks of waste in a slate quarry, and his land and sky are paint; for examples take his Wet Sand (205) or his Wintery Weather (454).

It is pleasant to turn from Mr. Hunter's performances to an artist whose works are consistently admirable. Zinnias (208) is a capital specimen of M. Fantin-Latour, and shows what composition, colour, and well-disposed masses of light, tints, and tones can effect in the production of a picture of brilliant tints and tones. The drawing proper is as good as it can be. Again, the same painter's Roses (261), a charming group of crimson, yellow, and white flowers, admirably arranged in a glass jar, is fine, artistic, and homogeneous, a triumph of grouping, and exemplary in all artistic points. His Sweet Peas (696) consists of delicately drawn blossoms, such as only this master of art in flower painting seems to be able to achieve, placed in a dark vase, and full of colour of the most delicate kind.—On the other hand, Mr. F. Bramley's Evening (217) is heavy, slight, painty, and quite unworthy of the distinguished promise of the artist.—It is a pity that Mr. L. Grier's twilight landscape called Light lingers on the Lowland (230) is badly hung and is ten times bigger than it need be, for it seems to show a good deal of feeling, and The Shutter (304), by the same artist, certainly possesses several enjoyable features.—We come upon a fine picture in Mr. M. R. Corbet's Morning Glory (300), a broad example of eclectic art applied to landscape, and representing with massive tones and force of colour vast grey mists rising in a still darkened meadow. The sullen glow of dawn, soon to become fiery, serves as a sort of background to the gloomy branches and sombre foliage of some trees which stand on the margin of a pool. The Arno in Flood (669) has quite as much majestic pathos. A line of white buildings on a bank, a still pool, much deep-toned herbage and foliage ably designed, go to form a work of choice art in a quasi-classic mood, not unlike that of Prof. Costa nor far removed from Gaspar Poussin.

There is no want of sentiment or poetry in Mr. E. Parton's landscapes of Picardy. In Water Meadows (308), for instance, there is a signal wealth of silvery grey and pearly tints. The subject is a broad, smooth pool surrounded by a wilderness of lush herbage and floating foliage arranged in masses, the treatment of which is very fine and simple indeed, and deftly harmonized with the long straight lines of the poplars characteristic of that region of the Somme, which Mr. Parton has so often painted. The greyish blueness of the denser foliage cuts off the horizon, in which a long white cloud is most skilfully introduced. The breadth and serenity of this picture belong to the higher and simpler sort of landscape painting. "When lingering Daylight welcomes Night's pale Queen" (344) is a charming and expressive picture of a very pale and delicate moonrise—a study of pure light between the night and day. A placid stream fringed with rushes, such as Mr. Parton loves, sparkles in faint silver between its almost level banks, and the graceful poplars that rise about it are flushed with rosiness so choice that few could paint them with so light a touch and so fine a sense of their colours. Hardly less commendable is the serene sky, the deeper turquoise of which is fading to that pale blue in which it is eventually lost. These characteristic elements are perfectly fused, and their tints and tones harmonized with singular skill.—Rosy sunlight at what Keats called "shut of eye," a wide marsh and a slow rivulet, are materials of which Mr. G. W. Jevons has made artistic use in Evening (248); while Miss C. Mura's Idyll (249), a picture of Ilfracombe, is not without merit and feeling for colour; and La Grande Grève, Sark (258), a capital representation of broad golden sunlight and its clear shadows upon the sea, is a promising work by Mr. F. J. Waugh. Mr. Waugh will go far if he draws, paints, and studies well-chosen subjects in so capable a fashion: but Mr. Somerscales must really do something fresher than Summer Afternoon in the Atlantic a Hundred Years Ago (266), which represents, in a rather inchoate and mannered fashion not applicable to such a subject as "the glorious First of June," an ocean of indigo colour, which, of course, is not of itself necessarily untrue, and various ships engaged in deadly strife. We do not like the sky nor believe in it at all; the ships are not the "facts" the subject requires, nor is any feeling or purpose imparted to the design by the effect, coloration, or composition of the work at large. It would not be unjust to say the sea is painty.—For Mrs. E. Forbes's Edge of the Wood (265) we do not care very much, although it is not by any means destitute of skilful touches or of a sense of the picturesque. But it reminds us too strongly of the inferior characteristics of Bastien-Lepage as a landscape painter, and it is heavily touched and rather opaque, as too much of his work was.—On the South Downs (273) is a far finer example of broad, natural, and simple art, the masterpiece, we think, of that capital landscapist Mr. J. Aumonier. It gives, as in capable hands it was bound to do, an adequate impression of warm light, wealth of colour, pure and harmonious tints, and the prodigious expansiveness of the atmosphere, which is surcharged by the sun.—The Salisbury (278) of Mr. C. E. Johnson is a sort of artificial Constable—that is to say, Constable as he was engraved in the annuals.—An Evening on the Lyn (298), by Mr. G. H. Swinstead, is decidedly pretty, but also rather conventional.

In the Ramsgate Sands (320) of Mr. J. Brett we come upon much more masculine work. It has the artist's characteristic brilliance and chiaroscuro of light and colour (not dark and colour, as is customary), and is intensely powerful. Promise of a Wild Night (534) is quite a different picture, and of a very different subject. It depicts that somewhat hard metallic glare which often indicates a coming tempest. The scene is the sea off the Land's End, with the Longships Light and Armed Knight as they are seen under a crescent of lurid clouds lined with rose-colours and dun, while the marble-like sea, much of its surface being polished like green glass, is beautifully drawn and exhaustively painted and modelled. On the horizon prodigious clouds are piled, tinged with pallid ash colours and livid purples, while it (the horizon) hides the extreme distance. The composition of the clouds is, we think, a little too formal, but the slender columns of light which issue from the sun's place behind the vapours have been almost as searchingly depicted as the surface of the waves below them. The Parting Hour (546), a Highland coast scene, is less attractive, because the composition of its several elements is not a little confused, and it appears to us, in spite of its abundant scholarship, to be somewhat painty and opaque. The best thing in the picture is the sky. A Summer Day off the South Bishop (617) is an admirably expansive view over a calm deep blue sea, with a rippling surface, and very luminous and pure throughout.—Ten times larger than it ought to be is Mr. J. N. Barlow's Moonrise (335), a picture of twilight, painted in over much paint, but by no means without poetry and grandeur such as we look for in every good landscape.—Mr. Alfred East's Lovely Road (338) is broad, telling in most respects, and therefore, although it is a little heavy, acceptable. As usual with the artist, the sky is well studied, and the clouds have been modelled with insight, care, and skill, qualities that are so very rare in sky-painting that we could not name in Burlington House ten thoroughly satisfactory skies. Except that it is larger than there was any need, A Sunlit Harbour (364), by this artist, is capital, abounding in colour, brilliantly and harmoniously lit, and, on the whole, one of the best representations of the season in which the "time between the sun and moon" is adequately dealt with.—The Sea Lavender (341) of Mr. F. Milner is also much too large, but distinguished by the tenderness of its tones and nacreous tints. The sky is good, so far as it goes, but that is not far enough for so fine a subject.—Commonplace and mannered, effective but shallow, is Mr. J. Farquharson's "Over snowfields waste and pathless" (358).—The First Christmas Dawn (385) of Mr. A. Goodwin is, on the whole, the greatest mistake in art he has been unfortunate enough to produce. It is a grand spectacle of rays of intense white penetrating the bluish atmosphere of dawn, and with its pallid silvery radiance touching the temples, towers, and walls of ancient Jerusalem. It is suggestive, but must needs owe much, if not all its poetry and beauty, to the spectator's inner consciousness or the association of his ideas with the history and the subject in question. As a piece of colour per se it possesses some lovely qualities, but these are not enough of themselves to make a picture.—Among the best sea-pieces here is Mr. A. J. Hook's Salvage after a Fog: Swimming Cattle from a Wreck (414), which is distinguished by the movement of the sea and its wealth of colour, the capital modelling of the water, and the brightness and harmony of the whole.—A Sea Nymph (406), by Mr. B. E. Ward, contains, besides an indifferent nudity (which, however, is accomplished so far as it goes), some creditable sunlight on the sea and shore.—The remaining landscapes and sea-pieces which are worth mentioning are Mr. A. Hopkins's In Tow (469), a boat at the stern of a steamer; A Perthshire River (551), by Mr. J. Smart; The Pool, Bolton Abbey (555), by Mr. A. Priestman; Bealmed (612), by Mr. A. H. Moore; From the Sunny South (746), by Mr. L. T. Sutcliffe; The North Ford, Uist (798), by Mr. R. W. Allan; Summer (803), by Mr. G. King; A Bit of Old Albion (845), by Mr. F. Althaus; and Mrs. Corbet's The Brook (914).

A PERSIAN INSCRIPTION.

Hollingbourne, Kent, June 10, 1894.

THE notice in the last number of the Athenæum of an inscription kept jealously from public view at the "shrine of Khwâjah Khizr Island, opposite Rohri, on the Indus," will interest those who, like myself, have been officially "stationed" in Upper Sind. The shrine in question (inclusive of immediate surroundings) is an artistic bijou in its way, allusion to which at the present hour recalls one of the most picturesque of spots in a generally desolate and dreary land. Sakkar on the right bank of the Indus, Rohri on the left bank, and Bakkar, an island in mid-stream—these three places, supplemented by the fairy-like islet of Khwajah Khizr, present a charmingly grouped landscape to the passing traveller; though it is to be feared that to the resident the attraction of first impressions may be but transient. A home in Sakkar, save in the brief cold season, will inevitably entail the inconvenience, if not suffering, experienced in a climate so hot and depressing that it has become, even to the stolid mind of the native sipdhi, associated with Stygian horrors.

I am surprised that the inscription should have escaped the notice of the late Sir Richard Burton, than whom no writer on Sind has ever more thoroughly and faithfully described that province and its inhabitants (that, too, when quite a young man at the outset of his Indian career). Nor can I recall any mention of it by Eastwick or other explorers in those parts. But in Burton's 'Scinde'; or, the Unhappy Valley,' is the following passage: "In the sixteenth century of our era a holy native of Istambol, or Constantinople, emigrated—for what reason it is not said—to Scinde. Finding Rohri a flourishing place.....he deposited in the Jamma Masjid, or the town cathedral, the Mûi Mubârik, or Holy Hair." A foot-note explains that the said "cathedral" was, according to epigraphic evidence, erected under the government of the Emperor Akbar, about A.D. 1575, so that the visitor from Western Islam may have had to do with its inauguration as well as its enrichment with a relic—possibly, also, with inscribing the date, now discovered, for the neighbouring shrine of Khwajah Khizr. The "hair" referred to is reported to be a veritable extract from the Prophet's beard, and is shown to visitors with great ceremony by the mujawir, or guardian of the shrine. Many years ago I had the privilege of being present when it was produced for the special inspection of Sir Bartle Frere, then Commissioner in Sind.

The difference of six hundred years between the actual date of the shrine and the inscription recording it need not be considered a serious discrepancy, for the latter may be read in the light of a certificate of ascertained fact, quite irrespective of contemporaneity. There seems no reason why the shrine of Khwajah Khizr should not date from the year named, A.D. 952, when Sind was still a dependency of the Abbasides, then, probably, represented by the Khalif Al Mat'i at Baghdad, the twenty-third ruler, in regular succession, of the dynasty.

Cries of London, in colours, "Knives, Scissors, and Razors," 141.; "Turnips and Carrots," 181. 10s. After Romney, in colours, Lady Hamilton at the Spinning-Wheel, by Cheesman, 501.; Lady Hamilton as Sensibility, by Earlom, 611.

Just-3rd Geniv.

It is understood that Lord Northbrook has offered for sale to the Trustees of the National Gallery three of the gems of his collection, and that the Trustees have been enabled to accept his terms, though a little time may elapse before the new acquisitions can be placed on the walls. The pictures thus acquired are the fine 'St. Giles,' by an anonymous Flemish master, being part of a diptych of which the other portion was until lately in the collection of Lord Dudley; the exquisitely finished little picture of St. Jerome, commonly attributed to Antonello da Messina; and the great Mantegna of Christ's agony in the Garden, which presents so interesting a comparison with the picture of the same subject by his brother-in-law Giovanni Bellini, which is already in the Gallery.

THE Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities, British Museum, has quite recently secured by purchase one of the choicest examples of ancient art in solid gold which even that great collection possesses. It is a vase of this metal in its purest condition, without sculptures, measuring nearly 8 in. in height, about 4 in. in diameter, and in shape most like a pelice when deprived of its handles. It is of Roman origin, perhaps of the period of Augustus. An inscription on the bottom of the vessel indicates that its weight nearly corresponds to two pounds, troy, of the modern scale. It was lately found by a sponge diver in the sea off the island of Samoa, and may be all that remains of a wreck which occurred there nearly two thousand years ago. Although not a

— gold vase embossed
With long-forgotten story, and wherein
No reveler had ever dipp'd a chin
But those of Saturn's vintage, this relic is not unworthy to have been among those which Keats's Endymion found while he was wandering in the sea-caves that were heaped with — things

More dead than Morpheus' imaginings:
Old rusted anchors, helmets, breastplates large
Of gone sea-warriors; broken beaks and targe;
Rudders that for a hundred years had lost
The sway of human hand.

The same Department has secured a still more ancient relic, and almost equally rare, being an Athenian stèle of about 400 B.C.; carved in the customary low relief within the usual encasement is the figure of a lady who had died and left her child to the care of a nurse. She is seated in a chair of the ordinary type, holds a casket upon her knee, and seems to be in the act of speaking to the nurse, who carries the infant in her arms. The design is good; the draperies, especially those of the young matron, are beautifully carved in a fine style. A fragment of an inscription—doubtless a portion of the name of the lady—still remains. This sculpture was discovered buried face downwards in the pavement of a wine-cellar at Alphington House, Jersey, which was built about 1730. It was probably brought to the island as part of the ballast of a ship trading from Greece, and, with other rubbish, used in the basement of the house. The then owner of the mansion left the marble to his son, who subsequently removed to Inverness, whence it came direct to the Museum.

MR. ALMA TADEMA is about to send to Berlin one of the most elaborate of his pictures, which has occupied him for an exceptionally long period. It is entitled 'Spring,' and represents one of the festivals with which the Romans welcomed the time of flowers and sunlight. The scene is a rather narrow street in Rome, shut in between lofty palaces of white and coloured marbles. The parapeted roofs and balconies are crowded with richly clad ladies casting upon the passers beneath handfuls of gorgeous flowers. The procession, which almost entirely fills the narrow street, is led towards us by a comely damsel dressed in silvery grey. Next comes a group of little barefoot girls, holding in their arms large bouquets of flowers, purple, red, and white, and, as their faces show, deeply absorbed in their office. The children are enclosed by a company of male musicians, including a performer on a syrinx and a cymbal player. Not far behind these are two men who carry on high the poles of an inscribed banner, which is festooned with violets, while near them on either hand are the bearers of the mystical silver statues of Pan, the torch-bearers, and more revellers loaded with flowers. The animated gestures and expressions of the personages suggest in the most spirited and spontaneous manner the music, songs, and joyful cries which attend the procession, while the brilliance of faces, flowers, and draperies is in keeping with the vividness of the sunlight, the richness of the hues of the marbles and bronzes upon the buildings, and the brightness of the blue sky overhead. The painting of the flesh, its finish, exquisite modelling, and solidity, the research and exhaustive delicacy of the touch which has been employed to depict all the ornaments, flowers, draperies, and jewellery of this remarkable picture, may be imagined. Some of the women's faces and figures are in the painter's best style and finest manner. 'Spring' will, it is understood, return to England in time for the Academy exhibition of next year.

MR. R. DUNTHORNE exhibits at 5, Vigo Street some new pictures by Mr. Watts.

MR. JAMES BRYCE will preside at the annual meeting of subscribers to the British School at Athens, which will be held at 22, Albemarle Street on Wednesday, July 11th, at 6 P.M. The report of the Managing Committee and of the Director will be submitted as usual. All persons interested in the subject are invited to attend.

AMONG other interesting features illustrated by the Home Arts and Industrial Association, now for a short time on view at the Albert Hall, are some noteworthy examples of the new Della Robbia pottery, which has its origin at Birkenhead, under the direction of Mr. C. Drexler and Mr. H. Rathbone. The examples comprise tobacco-pots, vases, coffee-pots, and similar ware, in which good forms, deep and varied colours, and a rich glaze—elements of considerable artistic distinction, much to be desired nowadays—are conspicuous.

At the next meeting of the Royal Archaeological Institute, to be held at 20, Hanover Square at 4 o'clock on Wednesday next, Mr. Somers Clarke will read a paper 'On the Devastation of Nubia,' wherein he will call attention to the number of temples and other antiquities which would be submerged and destroyed by damming the Nile either at Philæ or at Kalabaha, and also to the difficulty of the resettlement of the population now inhabiting the ninety miles of valley which would be laid under water.

THE famous collection of English coins formed by the late Mr. Henry Webb, of Redhill, will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby next month. The sale of the first portion will begin on Monday, July 9th, and end on Saturday, July 14th. This portion includes the Charles I. series, which must at least be nearly as complete as any now existing in private hands. The celebrated and historic "Petition" crown is also included, and as no specimen of this coin has been seen in an auction-room for several seasons, there is some curiosity about the sum it may realize.

THE heritors of Govan pariah have, by voluntary assessment, raised a sum of about 900. to be applied towards the erection of a suitable building for the better preservation of the valuable sculptured stones in the churchyard. However, to provide an adequate building about 3000. will be required, and the committee appeal to the public for the 2100. required. Some years ago the heritors erected a small house to preserve the very remarkable stone coffin discovered in the churchyard, and two of the hog-backed stones. It is proposed now to utilize a portion of this building, and to erect a corridor in which the other crosses may be placed for protection against the elements. The building will be lit from the roof, so that the tracery on the stones may be easily examined, and the key of the building will be deposited with the church beadle, who will be, therefore, able at any time to give access to the monuments. The committee consist of Sir John Stirling Maxwell, Bart., of Pollok, Mr. Parker Smith, of Jordanhill, M.P., and four other heritors.

THE Society of the Quest and the Birmingham Guild of Handicraft held an exhibition of pictures, drawings, wood engraving, printing, bookbinding, leather work, wood carving, furniture, and metal work, designed and executed by their members and associates, at the gallery of the Royal Society of Artists in New Street, Birmingham, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

C. E. S. C. writes:—

"Referring to a portrait by John Hoppner now at the Grafton Gallery, and catalogued as 'Mrs. Hoppner, wife of the Artist,' I fancy this picture may be improperly named, and really represents Mrs. Young, wife of an engraver who reproduced several of Hoppner's pictures. I possess a proof of Young's mezzotint of the above picture, which has the lettering 'Mrs. Young' very roughly and faintly etched in. This was evidently a trial proof before the ordinary lettering was engraved on the plate. At one time I had frequent opportunities of seeing the original picture, and also possess a very successful photograph of it in platinotype, which the then owner had taken shortly before the picture was sold at Christie's. The photograph and mezzotint differ very much from each other. The same gentleman possessed the companion picture by Hoppner, a portrait of Mr. Young (which has also been engraved), and he once told me that Mr. and Mrs. Young were his grandparents."

THE next exhibition of the Society of Portrait Painters will be held at the New Gallery in the autumn.

THE Forty-fifth Report of the Arundel Society shows that no essential change has occurred in the financial position of the body since the last balance sheet was issued. "The continued impoverishment of the classes from which the Society chiefly draws its support still further diminished its receipts last year both from annual subscriptions and separate sales." The balance in hand has been considerably lessened, although the expenditure has been reduced as much as possible. Some investments have been sold in order to pay what was due to the chromo-lithographers. Only forty-five Associates entered the Society during 1893. The rest of the Report is more hopeful, if not more encouraging. The publications of the current year are a chromo-lithograph from Pinturicchio's 'Nativity,' in 8. Maria del Popolo at Rome; and a similar reproduction of Luini's fresco in S. Maurizio at Milan, representing Ippolita Sforza kneeling in prayer. A transcript of one of the frescoes by Pinturicchio in the Piccolomini Library at Siena is in hand, and continues the series already begun by the Society. The Society has determined to undertake no new occasional publication at present, and has commissioned no new water-colour copies. A large collection of such drawings is already in hand.

THE Loan Collection of Pictures in the Corporation Art Gallery at Guildhall, which was opened to the public on April 2nd last, will be closed finally at 8 P.M. to-morrow (Sunday, July 1st), having been, on the whole, even more successful and attracted greater crowds than any of its forerunners. The opening of the gallery on Sundays has been highly appreciated by a class of visitors whose business does not allow them to take holidays in the weekdays. On five Sundays an aggregate of more than 18,000 persons visited the collection, and so excellent were the arrangements that not the least inconvenience was experienced by anybody.

THE New Gallery will, it is expected, be closed, as usual, on or about August Bank Holiday.

THE jubilee exhibition of pictures at the Peel Park Museum, Salford, is proving attractive. Last week it was visited by nearly 5,000 persons, and since the opening the attendance has exceeded 58,000.

THE Guild of Handicraft at Bow will publish at the close of the present month a volume by Mr. C. R. Ashbee, entitled 'Chapters in Workshop Reconstruction and Citizenship.'

THE latest news from Schliemann's Troy is that a hundred and twenty men are at work uncovering the walls of what the late archaeologist termed the sixth or Lydian city. There are indications of a gateway. A square well built of dressed stone has been found, and cleared to a depth of twelve yards. Various remains were found.

THERE is further news from Constantinople as to the colossal statue found near Moaul. Father Scheil, having deciphered the cuneiform inscriptions, assigns the monument to Tiglath Pileser, and is taking measures for its being transported to the Constantinople Museum.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

QUEEN'S HALL.—Philharmonic Concerts.
CRYSTAL PALACE.—Handel Festival.
DREYFUS LANE.—'Siegfried,' 'Tannhäuser.'

THE most successful season the Philharmonic Society has enjoyed for many years came to an end on Thursday last week with an interesting programme, the principal feature of which was Dvorák's latest Symphony in ϵ minor, No. 5. Much had been heard previously concerning this work, which it was confidently stated was based on negro plantation melodies, with which the composer was much impressed on his recent visit to the United States. This is only true to some extent, for, as the programme annotator says, Dvorák's desire has been "not to invent a new form, but to bend the native melodies to the old and generally accepted models, while treating them in a solid, substantial, and straightforward fashion—with, in other words, the plain directness, and absence of fantasy, which, in his view, may best satisfy Anglo-Saxon taste." These remarks may give the reader some general idea of the work, but a few notes on each movement are desirable. There is not much that is distinctive in character in the introduction adagio, but in the allegro molto which follows the themes have a distinct affinity with negro tunes, especially the second subject in the relative major. The slow movement largo, in the remote key of $\flat$ flat, is inspired by Longfellow's 'Hiawatha,' and is supremely beautiful. Mr. Krehbiel suggests that the lovely opening theme is intended to portray night on the margin of the forest; but this matters not, as the music can be at once appreciated on its own account. The details are full of picturesque effects, and the pianissimo close, where the instruments are withdrawn gradually until only the contra fagotti remain, is most touching. In the scherzo there is a reminiscence of Beethoven's 'Choral' Symphony, but nevertheless it is a fresh and piquant movement. In the finale antique effects are produced by the use of the minor seventh of the scale instead of the leading note, and the symphony comes to a melancholy yet extremely impressive close. Of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's bright and breezy nautical overture 'Britannia' we spoke when it was first performed a few weeks ago. Another overture, entitled 'Ariosto,' by Signor Vincenzo Ferroni, an Italian composer of growing reputation, had to be withdrawn, the parts sent from Italy being so badly written as to be illegible, Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischütz' being substituted. M. César Thomson gave a creditable though not wholly satisfactory interpretation of Beethoven's Violin Concerto; and Madame Sophie Menter, in conjunction with her former pupil, M. Sapellnikoff, did their best with Liszt's painfully ugly 'Concerto Pathétique' for two pianofortes, though, with the exception of one impressive theme, the music, if such it may be called, cannot be made attractive. Madame Amy Sherwin was acceptable as the vocalist.

It would, of course, be idle to speak in detail concerning the public rehearsal for the Handel Festival, which took place on Friday last week, for at the time of writing the festival itself is far advanced; but special commendation is due to Mr. Manns for making the day's work a genuine rehearsal and not a quasi-performance, as was the method of procedure in the time of Sir Michael Costa. The present conductor of these gigantic undertakings did not hesitate merely to arrest the music whenever he deemed it advisable, but took several entire movements a second time, thereby securing excellence in interpretation which would not have been otherwise attained, especially on the Selection Day. The executive force engaged for the great celebration now at an end differs slightly from that taking part in previous gatherings. As regards the choir the changes are inconsiderable, the singers, as before, numbering about 3,000. The orchestra was made up of 519 instrumentalists against 502 at the festival of 1891, the increase being not in the wood wind, which we are so frequently told ought to be made more conspicuous in the performance of Handel's music, but mainly by additions to the lower strings. The question as to the best method of rendering the masterpieces of the Anglo-Saxon composer has been much and rightly discussed of late years, and a valuable factor in the controversy was introduced by the discovery of some additional wood wind parts to 'The Messiah' at the Foundling Hospital in March last, as described by Mr. Prout in the Athenæum of March 31st. This find lends further weight of evidence to those who contend that the works of the old masters should be rendered at the present day in such a manner as not to do violence to the originals, though making them presentable to the ears of amateurs attuned to modern methods. In other words, the Scriptural text, "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life," should be carefully obeyed. In the composition of this year's orchestra at the Crystal Palace a diminution in the amount of percussion may be noted, and this is a distinct improvement. Generally speaking, the performance of 'The Messiah' on Monday was magnificent, at any rate as regards the choir, the tone being full and thrilling above the average, and the precision of the immense force extraordinary, considering that there had been no general rehearsal of the oratorio save as to the "Hallelujah" and "Amen" choruses. Madame Albani, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Santley were the principal vocalists, all being satisfactory.

On the Selection Day amateurs expect to make acquaintance with some of Handel's little-known compositions, and not for many years will there be any difficulty in making a suitable choice, the assertion made in print that the list is becoming exhausted being calculated to provoke a smile from those familiar with Handel's multitudinous scores. No fault whatever can be found with the list of items marked "first time" in Wednesday's programme. The chorus "Let our glad songs to Heaven ascend," from 'Deborah,' is a fine and massive example of the master's early efforts in oratorio; and the better-known "How dark, O Lord, are Thy decrees," from 'Jephtha,' with its realistic climax, is the finest choral number in his last oratorio. If there is nothing particularly striking in the Concerto in D for strings, oboe, bassoon, and organ, No. 6 of the so-called "Hautboy" Concertos, published in 1729, it was well worthy of performance; and the florid air "Vinto è l'Amor," from the opera 'Ottozone,' enabled Miss Ella Russell to display her flexibility of voice. She and Madame Melba both made successful first appearances at a Handel Festival. Madame Albani, Madame Clara Samuel, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Santley all sang with much effect in more or less familiar airs. The efforts of this year's magnificent choir were almost unsurpassable, the choruses already named, together with "Wretched lovers" and "As from the power of sacred lays," being among their finest efforts. It was pleasant to note that the barbarous maltreatment of Handel's scores by the late Sir Michael Costa is being steadily amended. This was specially noticeable on Wednesday in the 'Occasional Overture.' It is, of course, in a sense, inartistic to perform the favourite Violin Sonata in A by the full body of strings, but in face of the effect produced we have scarcely the heart to quarrel with this treatment of the work. Record of the performance of 'Israel in Egypt,' and of the general impressions left by the festival, must, of course, be deferred until next week.

The same general excellence that marked the performance of 'Die Walküre' at Drury Lane on Tuesday last week was noticeable in that of 'Siegfried' on Saturday. Once more was Herr Alvary inimitable in appearance, acting, and all details except in vocal method, as the youth who knows no fear; and the Brünnhilde of Frau Klafsky was again the most delightful impersonation in the way of grace and beauty at present to be witnessed on the lyric stage. It is singular that writers on music for the most part persist in regarding Wagner's music dramas solely from a musical standpoint, forgetful of the fact that they are intended to present several arts in combination. The great merit of Herr Alvary and Frau Klafsky consists not so much in their vocalization as in their skill in the art of graceful posing, whether in moments of repose or passion. The spectator with a taste for drawing can gaze at them, either together or separate, with pleasure, without reference to the musical accompaniment to the living pictures. Very little more remains to be said respecting last Saturday's performance. Herr Wiegand was precisely as usual in the part of Wotan, and Fräulein Olitzka unexceptionable as Erda. Herr Rodemund was somewhat inferior to Herr Lieban last year as Mime, both vocally and histrionically, though his embodiment was, on the whole, commendable; and Mr. David Bispham made the most of the small part of Alberich. Herr Lohse's orchestra, somewhat ragged in the first act, improved as the evening wore on, and played magnificently in the third act.

We have never as yet had a really artistic performance of 'Tannhäuser' in London, and that of Tuesday last left much to desire. It may safely be affirmed that Herr Alvary was not in full possession of his vocal resources, for his singing—if singing it may be called—in the titular rôle was at times quite painful, especially in mezzo voce passages; but he acted very finely, and declaimed the famous narrative in the third act with effective emphasis. Frau Klafsky was decidedly imposing as Elizabeth, but Fräulein Gherlsen has not the physique necessary for the part of Venus. In fact, the position of the two artists should have been reversed. Mr. David Bispham was excellent as Wolfram, and the minor parts were well filled. The mistakes in the orchestra, especially in the wood wind, were most irritating to those who are familiar with Wagner's score. Rarely have so many errors been noted at a public performance of recent years.

MADAME ALBANI.

To the present generation of musicians and amateurs the great artist who expired on Saturday last, at her residence between Versailles and Saint Cloud, only represented a tradition; but there are many still living who can remember her when she was in her prime. Born in 1826, Madame Albani began to achieve reputation at an early age, singing with success in concerts in Paris when she was only just of age. She then was engaged at the Italian Opera in the French capital, where her lovely voice was fully appreciated. Her success led to a lengthy and most successful connexion with the Grand Opéra, and her London career will be remembered with delight by veteran patrons of the lyric drama. Until the advent of the late Madame Trebelli it may be said that Madame Albani had no rival in principal contralto parts; but at the early age of forty she practically retired from the operatic stage. She sang, however, at concerts, public and private, from time to time, and also at church services on special occasions, and to her personal friends until recently, in spite of increasing infirmity. The principal cause of her death was internal cancer, but it was accelerated by obesity, which had increased to such an extent that for some years past she could not stand up to sing. Madame Albani's voice was a delicious mezzo-soprano rather than a contralto, and she had a compass of fully two octaves and a half. Occasionally she tried soprano parts, but with indifferent success. In private life Madame Albani was much esteemed and beloved, owing to her amiable disposition, and though her death leaves no void in the musical world at the present time, it cannot fail to be greatly regretted by a wide circle of personal friends.

Musical Society.

THERE was not a large audience at the concert recital of Gounod's 'Faust' at the Queen's Hall last Saturday afternoon, the first of a series of such performances under Sir Augustus Harris. Mlle. Nuovina, Mlle. Giulia Ravogli, M. Alvarez, M. Albert, and M. Plançon were all effective in the principal parts, and the orchestra and chorus were excellent, with Signor Bevignani as conductor.

PIANOFORTE recitals have not yet ceased for the season: one of the most recent was that of Miss Margaret Wild, formerly a pupil of Madame Schumann, at the Princes' Hall on Thursday last week. The clever young artist's programme included Schumann's Fantasia in C, Op. 17, and various other compositions of lesser magnitude by Brahms, Hermann Goetz, and Saint-Saëns.

AN excellent orchestral concert was given at the Royal College of Music on Friday last week, and the programme was noteworthy as only containing three items, namely, Mozart's 'Hafner' Symphony in D; the finale from 'Don Giovanni,' never heard now in performances of the opera; and Tchaikowsky's 'Symphony Pathétique' in a minor. The interpretation of these varied works, under the direction of Prof. Stanford, was extremely satisfactory.

THE brief series of Richter Concerts came to an end on Monday evening with a familiar Beethoven and Wagner programme. From the Bonn master's works was selected the Symphony in C minor, and from Wagner the Overture to 'Tannhäuser,' the prelude to the third act of 'Die Meistersinger,' the Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from 'Tristan und Isolde,' and the "Walkürenritt." Such a scheme, of course, requires no comment; but it is worthy of note that amateurs evince no symptoms of tiring of these threadbare pieces, not a seat in St. James's Hall being left unsold. There will be a further series of these concerts in the autumn.

THE Musical Guild finished its performances for the present season at the Kensington Town Hall on Tuesday last. A further series of concerts is announced to take place in November and December next.

M. PADEREWSKI will come to England specially to open the new premises at Messrs. S. & P. Erard's, 18, Great Marlborough Street, on Wednesday, July 11th.

MR. SCHULZ-CURTIS announces three more orchestral concerts at the Queen's Hall on November 6th, 20th, and 27th next. The first will be conducted by Herr Siegfried Wagner, who has expressed a desire to form a more direct acquaintance with the English public who so largely support the Bayreuth Festival performances, and the second and third by Herr Felix Mottl. Mr. Schulz-Curtius hopes to arrange with Frau Wagner for the performance of some important sections of 'Parsifal.'

MR. BEN DAVIES will give about twenty concerts on the Continent next autumn. The first will take place on October 22nd, the last on November 17th. He will sing, among other places, in Vienna and Budapest.

HERE ROBERT KAUFMANN has been engaged for the Bach Festival in April next, and will also sing for the Royal Choral Society in 'The Messiah' at the Albert Hall on Good Friday evening, April 12th, 1895.

HANS VON BÉLOW's letters are to be published by his widow, consequently her legal adviser has issued a declaration to prevent any unauthorized issue.

THE three-hundredth anniversary of the death of Orlando di Lasso (Orlandus Lassus) was celebrated on June 14th at Mons, in Hainault, where he was born in 1520, and at Munich, where he died as Kapellmeister in 1594.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

GAITEY.—'Madame Sans-Gêne.' Pièce en Quatre Actes, dont un Prologue. Par Victorien Sardou et Emile Moreau.

DALY'S.—'La Tosca.' 'La Dame aux Camélias.' 'Phédre.'

COMEDY.—'The Professor's Love Story.' Comedy in Three Acts. By J. M. Barrie.

IN his comic scenes M. Sardou is still under the influence of his first model, Scribe. This influence becomes more apparent when M. Sardou deals with those traditions or facts of Napoleonism which constituted a special province of his predecessor. It would be easy to believe 'Madame Sans-Gêne' a recovered comedy of Scribe, manipulated by a later hand. Its plot, if report is to be trusted, is by M. Moreau, who designed it expressly for Mlle. Réjane, and accepted gladly the finishing touches and amendments of his distinguished associate in the production of 'Cléopâtre.' Whatever may be the respective shares of the collaborators, the result is at least a triumph in which actors, scenic artists, and costumiers may claim a share. The authors have taxed very slightly their invention. Ready made to their hand, prominent in memoirs, was the famous Maréchale Lefebvre, Duchesse de Dantzig, Madame Sans-Gêne. Very slight alteration in the facts of her adventurous life fitted them for the stage. A background of scenes revolutionary or martial was no less easily supplied. All that was then wanted was a dramatic interest by which the comic scenes might be supported or strengthened.

This has been sought, but is scarcely supplied, in the love borne to the empress by an Austrian officer attached to her service in her father's Court. Anne of Austria is credited with a love intrigue with Buckingham; why should not Marie Louise, also an Austrian, inspire a similar passion? A Chastelard is provided in the Count of Neipperg, who throughout his presumptuous career is protected and saved by the heroine. Inspired with a fierce jealousy of this would-be intruder on his domestic fold, Napoleon consents himself to play the spy and almost the executioner. The empress is proved guiltless, and the escape of the Austrian is made the means not only of raising the position of Madame Sans-Gêne in the Court, but of rehabilitating Fouché and re-establishing him in power. Simple and in a sense ingenious is all this, but the result is not a play. It is just an animated and delightful spectacle. As such it is excellent. Nothing can be more gorgeous, more lifelike, more animated. And it is most of it true. We hear at the outset the boom of the cannon as the Tuileries is being assailed and defended. We see the Court of the emperor with its harlequin splendours; we listen to the domestic quarrels of Napoleon, Caroline, and Eliza; and we watch the emperor's espial of his wife. So perfect is the presentation of these, with everything correct to a garter button or a shoulder strap, that the whole delights us. The performance, meanwhile, except in one instance, to be hereafter mentioned, is superb. Scarcely a character is there, even to a persona muta, that could be better. Napoleon stands before us to the life. Lefebvre is equally admirable in his ferocious jealousy as a sergeant and his assumption of dignity as maréchal. The ladies of the Court, with their unveiled charms, leave nothing to be desired and little to be imagined. Amidst them all, vulgar, good-hearted, sensible, and sharp-tongued, shocking everybody, incurring countless reproaches, but giving "as good as she takes," goes Madame Sans-Gêne, charmingly over-acted by Mlle. Réjane. Let it be granted that there is every temptation to over-act and to pardon over-acting, and that the result convulses the audience with amusement and delight. All the same, a Samoan woman provided for the first time with a train would be less incommoded by it than is this ex-belle of the blanchisserie and present ornament of a court. Her grimaces are excessive and her movements impossible. All is forgotten, however, when we see the subjugation of the emperor, who, after insisting on her divorce from a husband she degrades and a court she dishonours, seems prepared to elevate her to quasi-imperial dignities. As a piece 'Madame Sans-Gêne' is so-so; as a spectacle it is one of the most effective ever exhibited.

Did space permit, an edifying contrast might be established between 'La Tosca,' revived on Monday at Daly's, and 'Madame Sans-Gêne.' Both deal with a period all but the same, both are built on similar lines, and both have the same undefinable indebtedness which in these late days is scarcely, perhaps, to be avoided. 'La Tosca' is, of course, the shapelier, and immeasurably the more dramatic work.

Its pictures of court life are more cynical and its characters are more sternly painted. Inferior as it is, however, the later work is more to our taste. Madame Bernhardt played the heroine with all her old subtlety and power. On Wednesday 'La Dame aux Camélias' was substituted, to be in turn replaced on Friday by 'Phédre.'

'The Professor's Love Story' is the most ambitious and most successful dramatic work Mr. Barrie has yet supplied. Its story is simple, innocent, interesting, and diverting, and its comic underplot is delightful. The main action presents the subjugation by love of a servant so absorbed in technical pursuits as to pass for a misogynist. The object of his unconscious worship is a female secretary. So far is he from recognizing the actual state of affairs, that when told by his physician that his symptoms are those of love, he buries himself in the country, out of reach, as he believes, of feminine machinations, but takes his secretary with him. Very pleasant and soul-satisfying is the manner in which the saucy and resolute little minx completes his subjugation, and enlightens him as to the nature of his sentiments towards her. The quaintly humorous procedure of the professor gloating over his secretary, neglecting for her sake his cherished pursuits, following her like her shadow, and basking in the sunshine of her presence, yet ignoring completely his feelings towards her, furnishes Mr. Willard with opportunities which he turns to highest advantage. His impersonation of the character is a piece of true and fine comedy. Miss Bessie Hatton plays with vivacity and grace as the heroine, and the entire effect is irresistible. The scenes of love-making between a maidservant and two canny Scottish lovers, slow, prudent, and unemonstrative, are taken from the author's 'Courting of T'nowhead's Bell,' which is one of his 'Auld Licht Idylls.' They are played in unsurpassable fashion, and prove an attractive feature in one of the prettiest and healthiest pieces the stage has recently seen.

Edmond Gondinet: Théâtre complet. Tome III. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)—Unlike most French dramatists of the day, M. Gondinet, the success of whose works on the stage is incontestable, is less amusing in the closet. 'Le Club,' the most pretentious of the plays included in his third volume, is a little confusing in perusal, and decidedly less amusing than it appeared when played in 1877 at the Vaudeville, with MM. Berton, Dieudonné, Train, and Munié, Madame Bartet, and Mlle. Réjane in the principal parts. As a sketch of Parisian manners it is excellent, though its intrigue is of the slightest. The piece is curious, inasmuch as its second act passes in a club without the appearance of any feminine personage. 'Le plus heureux des Trois,' in which M. Gondinet collaborated with M. Labiche, is a finely written satire, given at the Palais Royal in 1870, with Geoffroy magnificent as Marjavel, and Brasseur, Lheritier, and Gil-Péres in other parts. 'Les Convictions de Papa' is a droll sketch of parliamentary intrigue, and 'Les Révoltées' a social sketch in fairly elastic and successful verse.

Dramatic Gossip.

MR. IRVING has bought the English rights of 'Madame Sans-Gêne,' with a view to putting Miss Ellen Terry into the part of the Maréchale. It is far from improbable that she may, like Signora Duse, show us that M. Sardou's pieces gain by being treated as comedy instead of farce. What, however, is to become in a translation of the argot of which Madame Sans-Gêne makes such constant use is not easily conjectured. It speaks volumes for the erudition or the—something or other of English matronhood that the passages which depended upon the niceties—the word is scarcely happy—of French slang (passages by which more than one Frenchman was perplexed) were those precisely from which the English public derived most amusement and gratification.

MISS ELLEN TERRY will shortly appear in a version of 'La Locandiera,' prepared expressly for her by Mr. Comyns Carr.

VERY much superior to pieces given ordinarily under similar conditions is 'A Family Matter,' a three-act comedy, by Messrs. G. G. Compton and A. George Hockley, given on Wednesday afternoon at the Garrick Theatre. It has a melodramatic basis, and is burdened with some superfluous dialogue. The plot is, however, sympathetic, and well told. The dialogue is, as a rule, good, and the characterization excellent. The performance is ominously praiseworthy. Miss Mary Burke, Miss Ellis Jeffreys, and Mr. Charles Groves were quite admirable; and Mr. Bucklaw and Miss Winifred Emery deserve favourable mention. Both piece and performance deserve to be brought before a larger public.

'CHERRY HALL,' a three-act "play of modern society," by Mr. Forbes Dawson, has been given at an afternoon representation at the Avenue Theatre. It tells a story of the Enoch Arden order. A naval officer reported to be dead, but in reality imprisoned by African savages, returns to find his wife prosperously married. He proposes to efface himself and leave undisturbed a state of things for which chance alone is responsible. The lady, however, who recognizes him, has the unhappy inspiration to visit him at the most indiscreet of hours, and in the most compromising of costumes. When detected by her husband she first screams loud enough to be heard throughout the hall, then successfully counterfeits somnambulism. As husband number two conveniently and obligingly dies, nothing serious comes of the attempt to hoodwink him. Mr. Glenney plays in this the returning traveller. So weak was, however, the general interpretation, and so unconvincing were the comic scenes, that the whole gave no promise of enduring vitality.

'THE JERRY BUILDER' has been transferred from the Grand Theatre, Islington, to the Strand. It furnishes Mr. Edouin with opportunities for some rather grotesque fun, and reveals in Miss May Edouin talents from which much may be hoped.

'THE TEXAN,' a four-act melodrama by Mr. Tyrone Power, with which the Princess's reopened on Thursday night in last week, supplies a picture of a woman of marvellous beauty and fiendish cunning, whose seductions were more satisfactorily presented by Miss Edith Crane than was her wickedness. The author gave a good picture of a frank-hearted, staunch, and half-educated Texan confronted for the first time with the mysteries and difficulties of civilization.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

"One of Mr. Blackmore's best."—Saturday Review.
BY THE AUTHOR OF 'LORNA DOONE.'
NOW READY, a CHEAP EDITION, crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d., of

"SPRINGHAVEN."

By R. D. BLACKMORE.

Of 'Springhaven' the Saturday Review says:—"The story is one of Mr. Blackmore's best. A fine touch of romance reveals the author of 'Lorna Doone' on almost every page. The portraits of Nelson and Napoleon are marvellously true and lifelike."
"Spirited and 'glorious' as strong terms, but they are scarcely too strong for application to some parts of 'Springhaven'... The story is among the author's best; and to read it is a most invigorating tonic."—Illustrated London News.

NEW NOVELS AND STORIES.

SARAH: a Survival. By Sydney CHRISTIAN, Author of 'Lydia.' 2 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, 12s.

"A wholesome as well as a graceful book, full of charming and wholesome teaching, and written with a decided distinction of style."—Athenæum.

"At last we have a story of a woman and of womanhood which may be read with satisfaction and pleasure. 'Sarah a Survival,' by Sydney Christian, is a remarkable work in every sense. It is rarely original and not eccentric; it is thoughtful and has pretensions; it is interesting as a narrative and extremely clever as a study of character. It is written in admirable English, and abounds in humour of a quiet, delectable kind. 'Sarah' is a gem. So far as her old acquaintance, who rebukes his pride and proper sister, is concerned, he is 'thankful to say it is never Sarah's head to be grateful.'—World

A BAIREUTH PILGRIMAGE. By

EDITH R. CUTHBERT. 2 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, 12s.

"A story that will unquestionably interest a large circle of readers."—Contemporary.

LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS OF THE ENGLISH LAKES.

By Rev. H. D. RAWNSLEY,
Honorary Canon of Carlisle.

Vol. I. CUMBERLAND, KESWICK, and SOUTHERN COUNTRY.

Vol. II. WESTMORELAND, WINDERMERE, and the HAUNTS OF WILDERMOUTH.

"Canon Rawnsley's 'Literary Associations of the English Lakes' to exceed in scope those of the 'Literary History of the Lakes,' the volume on 'Florence and Venice,' and 'Huddersfield to Spain &c.' The volume is just coming when thousands of pilgrims will find their way, some homeward, some reverently, to Wordsworth country and Southernland, and so can only assume them that Canon Rawnsley's guide-book will add a thousand-fold to the interest of every step they take there, and double the delight of every night they see."

"Canon Rawnsley sets himself, and in our opinion, with a large measure of success, to enable the traveller, in whatever part of the district he may be, to realise the particular presence which are there at the call of the well-informed imagination."—Leader in the Leeds Mercury.

Crown 8vo, 25s. pp. 4s. 6d. net.

Professor MACCUNN.—ETHICS of CITIZENSHIP. By JOHN MACCUNN, M.A., Pro- fessor of Philosophy in University College, Liverpool.

"This is one of the best books of our time. It is not large, but in its way it is great. It is not lengthy, but it is complete; and full of the best things."—Leader in Liverpool Daily Post, June 11.

"Ethics of Citizenship is a little book which, for general usefulness, far exceeds the massive tomes in which ontological philosophers are accustomed to impart the darkness of their cogitations. The book starts the reader on clear paths in conclusions on which common sense depends, and gives him for guidance an will-able to dance before him, but a failure to carry in his hand."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Dr. MACKINTOSH.—The NATURAL HISTORY of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION. Being a Study of the Doctrine of Jesus as Developed from Judaism and Converted into Dogma. By WILLIAM MACKINTOSH, M.A. D.D.

"It will be impossible for his readers to deny the high intellectual quality of this book, and the truly Christian temper in which it is written. It is in this respect an example of how much may be conceded on the dogmatic side of Christianity without being its real essence."—Christian World.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Professor MACCUNN.—TENNY- SON'S IDYLLS of the KING and ARTHURIAN STORY from the SIXTEENTH CENTURY. By M. W. MAC- CUNN, M.A., Professor of Modern Literature in the University of Sydney.

"The history of a great legend and its literary fruits has seldom been written more conscientiously and learnedly."—Times.

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Mr. BALDWIN BROWN.—STOICS

and SAINTS: Lectures on the Later Heathen Moralists and on some Aspects of the Life of the Medieval Church. By the late JAMES BALDWIN BROWN, M.A., Minister of Brixton Independent Church.

"The ripe scholarship, the keen historical dissection, the width of view, the grasp of genuine enthusiasm, the lofty and almost austere conscience, were characteristic of their author, and are all apparent in these noble lectures."—Independent.

TOLSTOI'S BOYHOOD.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

And Translated by CONSTANTINE POPOFF.

"This edition comprises in one volume what has hitherto been issued in two or three; and in point of style it is indubitably the best English version of the Russian novelist's remarkable biographical work." Academy.

"One of the most faithful and closely retrospective autobiographies of the opening years of life that has ever been given to the world. Mr. Popoff's translation reads easily, and, as he is a Russian, we may count upon its accuracy." Literary World.
